Mr. Speaker, it will, in my judgment, make unnecessary hereafter the use of so much whitewash in making reports upon bribery charges, and the people may have whitewash for their fences throughout the country in which we live at a reduced price. [Applause.] When the Constitution was formed we had just gained our independence from the mother country. The people were divided between democracy and monarchy. A republic to them was an experiment, never having been blessed by a free government, and many of them yearned for it; others feared it. These two contending forces were represented in the constitutional convention. England had a House of Lords, and that was the idea that actuated those who desired that the Senate should be made up of ambassadors, as some called them, from the various States, and should be as nearly as possible like the House of Lords. Yet England, in the few months recently passed, has been in a terrific political upheaval in order to try to abolish that body, after which this very provision in our Constitution was patterned. [Applause.] The people of the various States—30 of them—have approached as nearly as they could, by primary-election laws, the election of Senators by direct vote of the people. The Democratic national platform for many years has urged this great reform and has declared that it is the gateway to all other reforms. [Applause.] And I am delighted now, Mr. Speaker to know that this reform for which the Democratic Party was the pioneer in its advocacy meets to-day practically the unanimous approval of all Americans.

Who is prepared to say that it was a mistake to lodge in the hands of the people the right to elect Members of Congress. The great reforms that have blessed this country have originated in this body at the hands of men sent fresh from the people, men who had listened to the heartbeats of those whose votes they asked and received at the polls, those who had been trusted by the people, and who were willing to trust those who had trusted them. [Applause.] This amendment, Mr. Speaker, will reduce to a minimum the opportunity for corruption in the election of Senators to the Senate of the United States. One of the most favored means of corrupting men under the system as it now exists in the election of Senators by the State legislatures is by the candidate for the Senate going into the various counties in a legislative district and saying to John Jones, "You are a candidate for the Democratic nomination," or the Republican nomination, as the case may be; "I want to contribute to your campaign fund to aid you in getting your nomination," and then going to another one in another county and saying the same thing, and thus spreading his money around in the various legislative and senatorial districts under the pretense of aiding the candidate to secure the nomination, when his real purpose was to secure the vote of that candidate in his race for the United States Senate. And when the candidate had been successful and was commissioned by his people as their representative, he felt that he was obliged to vote for the man who had helped him to secure his election. This amendment to the Constitution will give to the poor men of this country a chance to go before the people and submit their claims. It will make hereafter, Mr. Speaker, unnecessary the monotonous reading in the daily newspapers that the legislature of such and such a State cast the eleven thousand nine hundred and ninety-eighth ballot and the result was no election. It will result in sending men fresh from the people, men who truly and really represent them. It will give the people confidence in their Government.

Mr. Speaker, those who oppose this amendment to the Constitution do so because they really believe that a few men are wiser than all the rest. This was the argument upon which thrones were builded and dynasties perpetuated, but it has no place in a Republic like this. [Applause.] That government will live longest which is best loved, and that one will be best loved that gives the greatest liberty to the people. Adopt this amendment; meet the desires of the American people; give the States of the Union an opportunity to make it a part of our Constitution; make the Senate what it ought to be, a body in which the representatives of the people, elected by the people, represent truly the people; and I sincerely trust, Mr. Speaker, the day is not far distant when the Senators in every State in this Union will be, under this amendment to our Federal Constitution, elected by the direct vote of the people. [Loud applause.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes, or 10 if he desires it, to my colleague from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

[Mr. CLAYTON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I yield five minutes to my colleague from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of this proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution as it is drawn and as it comes from the committee.

When the United States Constitution was formed, democracy itself was on trial. There were not lacking those in the Federal Convention who desired to see a constitutional monarchy or an aristocracy clothed with permanent political power. A leader who has since been adopted as the patron saint of a political party of these days believed in the election of United States Senators for life. Unquestionably out of that conflict of opinion grew the compromise that the choice of Senators should be removed one step from election by the people. It was honestly believed by many that democracy could not secure absolute safety of life and property; but a hundred years of test have proven that democracy is no longer on trial. Democracy has shown that it can secure the safety of life and property; that there is no need for the checks and balances between the will of an intelligent people and the power of those to whom they delegate their political rights. It is not from the people that corruption comes, and that has been the lesson of the century of American history. The man who takes his dinner pail in the morning and leaves his humble home to perform eight hours' honest work in creating the wealth of the Nation; in adding to comfort and civilization; in making the world a better place to live in, and goes back to his home to sleep the sleep of honest toil, is not hanging around the State legislature with a design to corrupt it, to send men to the Senate. [Applause.]

The man who feeds his team before daylight, and at the first streak of dawn is in the field tilling the soil or garnering the golden harvests that shall be sent abroad or bless the homes and fill the dinner pails of countless thousands of his fellow citizens has no time to corrupt the State legislature to send men in his interest to the United States Senate, but these are the men upon whose broad shoulders rests the perpetuity of the Republic. [Applause.] This amendment is designed to place the power of choosing Senators where the right to choose them belongs—in the common, everyday, intelligent, honest, patriotic voters of the country. [Applause.] A hundred years have proven that the corruption incident to free government does not come from the homes of the average voters, but does come from special interests so equipped as to make their influence predominant in the choosing of select bodies. It is to cure that evil that the American people are now demanding the right to the direct election of United States Senators. And now, on this 13th day of April, on the day that over 7,000,000 American freemen are glad to celebrate as the birthday of him whose influence has echoed down through all the corridors of time in the forming of the American Republic; on the natal day of the Sage of Monticello, this House of Representatives can do no better than to perform its part to crystallize into law the will of the American people and the expressed belief of Thomas Jefferson by passing this amendment to the Constitution. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Will the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] use some of his time now?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PICKETT].

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to discuss that part of the resolution relative to the election of Senators by a direct vote of the people. I do not regard that part of the resolution as being in controversy here. There is little, if any, division of opinion in this body on that question. If the resolution was confined to that proposition alone, it would have been passed before this, and this debate would not now be in progress.

The resolution, however, contains another proposition separate and distinct from the proposed change in the method of electing Senators. It is proposed to withdraw from Congress its control over the time and manner of holding elections for United States Senators, as prescribed in paragraph 1, section 4, Article I, of the Constitution.

The framers of our Constitution vested in Congress under said section 4 the power to review and to make or change the regulations of the States with respect to the time and manner of holding elections both for Senators and Representatives in Congress. That this was a proper grant of power seems clear. It can not be urged that thus far in our history it has been improperly used. It is unlikely that it may ever be necessary to use it. On the other hand, some occasion or exigency may arise, which we can not now foresee, when it would be quite necessary for Congress to have such power. The fact that the power exists will have the effect to prevent the occasion for its use. It is now proposed to withdraw that power in so far only as it applies to the election of United States Senators. While I am not familiar with the debates of this body in past years when resolutions relative to changing the method of electing Senators were under consideration, I am informed by those older in the service that the proposition involving the withdrawal from Congress of its power over regulations as to the time and manner of elections for Senators has never been embodied in any of the resolutions heretofore presented, and that the question has never been considered in this House. It is before us for the first time. It involves a change in our fundamental law without any apparent or stated reason for doing so. It is concededly not necessary to give effect to the proposed amendment for the election of Senators by a direct vote. No such contention is even made. In fact, the author of and sponsors for the proposition advance no argument in support of it. I am not prepared at this time to discuss the question either as to the wisdom of the change from a governmental point of view or as to the construction that may be given to it in the form in which it is presented, with the care and preparation which a question of so much importance demands.

Serious controversy has already arisen as to its effect. On the one side it is urged that it will withdraw from Congress the control granted under section 4 of Article I, both as to Senators and Representatives. On the other side it is claimed that it applies only to Senators. It is to be regretted that the propositions are not presented in separate resolutions, as they ought to be. The people have a right to pass on these questions separately. Why encumber the proposition to change the method of electing Senators by another proposition, separate and distinct from it and on which there is already serious controversy and the effect of which on the general resolution we can not foresee?

When the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], a few moments ago, in reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], was urging that the amendment would only apply to the power of Congress over election of Senators and not as to Representatives, it occurred to me to be a most peculiar and anomalous position to say that Congress, composed of both Senate and House—one legislative body—should have control over the election of the Members of one of its branches and not of the other. If the power should exist as to one, why not as to the other? If the grant of power is proper in one case, why not in the other case? The analogy is complete. The principle is the same. There is and can be no distinction.

The gentleman from Kentucky, turning to this side of the House, expressed regret that we should raise this question, and charged that we were trying to bring up and revive sectional differences. I want to say to the gentleman that we have not revived that issue. You yourselves have presented the issue. The resolutions heretofore presented to this House for submission to the people of an amendment to the Constitution providing for election of Senators by direct vote did not contain the further proposition now presented, and when the committee composed of and controlled by the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle brought in the resolution before us containing for the first time in this body the proposition in controversy, they themselves raised the question and are responsible for it.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. PICKETT. Certainly.

Mr. JAMES. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, composed of a majority of Republicans, reported this identical amendment in the very language we propose it, and that the author of it was Senator BORAH, a Republican?

Mr. PICKETT. It has been stated a dozen times during this debate that such is the fact.

Mr. JAMES. Then why does the gentleman say that we brought up and precipitated the issue? Why do you not put it on your own party?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. PICKETT. There is no point in the observation of the gentleman from Kentucky. I was referring to the history of the proceedings in this House. He pointed his finger over here and observed that we had raised this question. I say to the gentleman from Kentucky that your committee raised this question so far as this House is concerned.

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman from Iowa dodges the issue. One of his own party raised the issue in the Senate report.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Speaker, I refuse to yield unless the gentleman from Kentucky wishes to ask a question. This side of the House is not responsible for what any Senator may or may not do or for what any committee of the Senate may or may not do. This House is governed by its own precedents, its own acts. I was speaking of this body and not of another body; but I will say that if we are to look for precedents, as the gentleman insists, then we should take the action of the Senate when it struck from the resolution the part now in controversy and left the resolution as a simple and direct proposition to amend the Constitution with respect to the method of electing United States Senators.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. PICKETT. I will.

Mr. COOPER. I heard the gentleman say that Congress retained the power by virtue of the Constitution as to the time and place and manner of electing Representatives in Congress. I would like to ask what section that is.

Mr. PICKETT. Paragraph 1, section 4, of Article I of the Constitution. In conclusion, I wish to emphasize the importance of due deliberation in passing on a question of so much importance as the withdrawal from Congress of its power over the election of its own Members, and I certainly hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] to the resolution may prevail. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire how much time has been consumed on the one side and on the other?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan has 1 hour and 5 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Missouri 46 minutes remaining.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I now yield, Mr. Speaker, 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no question of the wisdom of the fathers in making the provision they did in regard to the election of United States Senators. They had not learned, as we have learned, how dependable and safe is an educated democracy. Furthermore, they did not have in those days the widespread opportunities of education, the high average of intelligence, and the widely diffused knowledge of governmental affairs that the people have at this time. Furthermore, times have changed, and conditions confronting and surrounding us are vastly different from what they were at the time the Constitution was adopted.

The people generally throughout the country have come to the conclusion that it is better to elect Senators by direct vote. So widespread is this feeling that in at least 27 States provisions have been made intending, so far as it is possible to do so under the Constitution, to provide for a direct expression of the people in the election of Senators. Even though I did not believe, as I do believe, that the Senators should be elected by a direct vote of the people, I should believe it and hold it my duty to vote for a resolution to give the people of the States an opportunity to express their opinion on that question; but, Mr. Speaker, we are unfortunate in the form of the resolution now before us. It is, in my opinion, faulty in two essential respects. The demand has been for the election of Senators by a direct vote of the people.

The resolution before us does not contain a provision specifically providing for the election of Senators by a direct vote of the people, and I am not certain that the courts might not hold that the language used in the resolution would authorize the election of Senators through some intermediary body. Second, there has been interjected into this resolution a provision amending section 4 of Article I, entirely foreign to the question which has been so widely agitated among the people, taking from the Congress of the United States supervision and control over the election of Senators, and probably over the election of Representatives in Congress. There has been no demand at any time among the people of the country for a constitutional change of this character. No party platform has ever demanded it, and, in my opinion, it is not desired by the people. In order to meet these objections I shall offer in my time a substitute for the resolution now before the House, said substitute being in the form of the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] in the last Congress and reported to the House. That resolution provides clearly and specifically for the election of Senators by a direct vote of the people. That resolution does not relate or refer to section 4 of Article I, and it presents in a concrete form and in simple language for the consideration of the people of the country the great question which has been so widely discussed for such a length of time, to wit, Shall Senators of the United States be elected by a direct vote of the people?

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield for a question.

Mr. POWERS. Section 4 of Article I of the Constitution now provides that—

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof, but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. POWERS. I had not completed my question.

Mr. MONDELL. What was the gentleman's question?

Mr. POWERS. I would like to know in what instance Congress has ever felt it necessary to interfere with the time, manner, and so forth, of holding elections as prescribed by the Constitution?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it does not occur to me that it is important to inquire whether Congress has ever thought it necessary to exercise this authority, though, in fact, it has done so. The important thing about it is that it is a part of the fundamental law of the land. There has been no general demand for its repeal or its amendment. There has been no debate anywhere or discussion by the people in favor of a change or amendment to that provision of the Constitution. The time may come when it is of the utmost importance that Congress shall exercise this power, and certainly the majority, if it is acting in good faith, ought not, in presenting this proposition on which we are generally agreed, insist on coupling it with another and entirely different matter, in regard to which there is a wide difference of opinion. I shall vote for the substitute I have offered; if that is defeated, I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG]; and if that is defeated, I shall vote for the resolution; not that I think it should pass in that form, but because I expect it to be amended in the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, I offer as a substitute this resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read the substitute.

The Clerk proceeded to read the resolution.

Mr. JAMES (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that if the amendment is to be read it must be read in the time of the gentleman who offered it, or in the time of that side of the House.

The SPEAKER. It is being read in that time.

Mr. JAMES. I thought the time of the gentleman had expired?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman had expired, but the gentleman had the resolution in his hand ready to send to the Clerk's desk, and I thought it was only fair to have it read.

Mr. JAMES. I agree with the Chair that it is fair; but it is equally fair that it should be taken out of somebody's time.

The SPEAKER. It will be taken out of the time of the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. If the gentleman insists, I will yield more time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeded with and concluded the reading of the substitute, as follows:

> Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert the following:
> "That the following amendment be proposed to the legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures, shall become and be a part of the Constitution, namely: In lieu of the first and second paragraphs of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States of America, the following shall be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution:
> "'SEC. 3. That the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, who shall be elected by a direct vote of the people thereof for a term of six years, and each Senator shall have one vote; a plurality of the votes cast for candidates for Senator shall elect, and the electors shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.
> "'When vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, in the representation of any State in the Senate, the same shall be filled for the unexpired term thereof in the same manner as is provided for the election of Senators in paragraph 1: Provided, That the executive thereof shall make temporary appointment until the next general or special election, held in accordance with the statutes or constitution of such State.'
> "This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as a part of the Constitution."

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL].

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Speaker, it is no light thing to amend the Constitution of the United States. That is legislative work which no body of men is capable of performing offhand. I do not think that we should try to improvise substitutes for the different articles now contained in our organic law. Gentlemen will remember the amendment that was hastily put through the two Houses of Congress less than two years ago to impose an income tax, and there is one thing about that amendment, about its form, that has given better ground for opposition than everything pertaining to its substance, and that is that the amendment was so sweeping in character that it gave to the Federal Government in terms the power to tax the incomes derived from State bonds and from municipal bonds and from the other instrumentalities of local government, and, as we know, it has been held that the power to tax is the power to destroy, we conferred by that amendment in terms the power to the National Government to wipe out of existence any local government of the country. I regret, therefore, that this amendment should not have been more carefully considered and that there should not have been time given to the Members of the House to read the report and to study the form in which it is presented and to determine whether they should vote for it or not. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not see any objection to having the people of the different States elect their representatives in the Senate precisely in the same way as they elect their governors or as they elect their Members of this House. I am in favor of that proposition, notwithstanding the fact that the old system has generally worked well, and notwithstanding that the application of the new system in some States has not invariably worked well. For years the legislatures performed their functions a good deal in the way it was intended the electors for President should perform their functions, and they sent a fine body of men to the United States Senate; but, under the pressure of modern conditions, after men had accumulated great wealth, a new era was brought in and the system did not work uniformly so well. We elect a legislature; that legislature is chosen for the purpose of enacting laws to govern the State.

It is not chosen primarily for the purpose of electing the men to represent the State in the Senate, and the result is that the members of that legislature are turned over to intrigue and earboring, and nobody knows what other arts in order to influence their judgment. I believe it would be more open, it would be better, that we should have better popular government if the people should vote directly for their Senators. Now, that that system has not worked well in some of the States, in my opinion, is due to the conditions of some of the States' primary laws. State primary laws may be good things, but a State primary law that permits the members of one party to enter the caucus of the other party and dictate its nominees is nothing but a low swindle upon representative party government. [Applause.] Now, Mr. Speaker, there is one part of this proposed amendment that I very much object to, and I object to it so strongly that I shall vote against the whole proposition if it remains in the resolution. It is proposed to take from the National Government the supervisory power that the framers of the Constitution put there and that it should have. No matter if it has been a sleeping power up to this time, it may sometime be a power that is vital to the preservation almost of the Republic. It proposes to take away from the National Government the supervisory power that it has over the electing of the members of the great political department of the Government. You destroy the symmetry of the instrument by permitting that, and providing, or permitting it may provide, that these regulations concerning the Members of this House——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. McCALL. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will have to content myself.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I hope the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] will use some of his time now.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. The gentleman has more time than I have.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Then I will yield——

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I was very much interested in the argument of the gifted gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL]——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. STANLEY. Although I do not entirely agree with him, I will yield him two minutes of the time that has been allotted to me. [Applause.]

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend from Kentucky for yielding to me and for the kindly terms in which he has done so. I had about finished my argument, and I do not think that I care to resume it now. I thank the gentleman from Kentucky, but will return the time to him.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, as has been said repeatedly, this has not been and is not now a partisan question. I do not think there is much diversity of opinion to be found in the membership of this House upon the general proposition of electing United States Senators by a direct vote of the people. I do think, however, that there has been injected into this general discussion a feature that might properly be considered more at length than the one on which we are practically agreed. I refer, of course, to that paragraph which purports to assign and give to the States the absolute power to decide the time, manner, and place for the selection of United States Senators. It seems to me, notwithstanding the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], that one great branch of the Government is hereby surrendering its power to perpetuate and maintain itself. It is giving to the States a right which the symmetry of the Constitution, which our scheme of government, nationally conceived, requires should rest with the Federal power.

The proponents of this feature of the resolution have overlooked the great necessity our Government is under to protect and maintain the respective sovereignties of State and Nation. As all the world knows, the great principles contained in our Constitution were not the invention of the framers of that document, but the result of centuries of political evolution on the part of the Anglo-Saxon race. That feature which is perhaps most original is the division of sovereignty between State and Nation. The distribution of sovereignty, agreed upon in the constitutional convention, has been materially changed during the decades that have passed, due to the unfolding of political and economic forces.

It is natural that both the States and the Federal Government should be jealous of their rights, and each particularly jealous of any encroachment of power on the part of the other. The very system of our Government, and therefore the perpetuity of our institutions, depend upon the proper distribution of sovereign power between State and nation. By this section of the proposed amendment the Federal Government places the control and perpetuity of an important element of its sovereignty in the possession of the States. If States have exclusive control of the time, manner, and place of electing United States Senators they can, if it pleases them to usurp the function, control the most important part of the legislative branch of the Government. By refusing to elect at all, the legislative arm of the Federal Government would be paralyzed. Many men now live who witnessed almost one-half of the States withdraw from the Union and refuse to send Members to Congress. That which happened once may happen again, and under such conditions the Federal Government should be able to exercise supreme control over the election of those who are to exercise Federal legislative power.

If, perchance, State legislatures should give to Congress the right to select members of the State legislatures, to prescribe the time, manner, and place, how ridiculous it would be. Equally ridiculous is it for the National Government thus to surrender its power.

We are frankly told by gentlemen from the other side of the Chamber that the main purpose of this section is to prevent, on the part of the Federal Government, interference with disfranchisement of the negro, now practically complete, in all the Southern States. Such a statement condemns the section and gives emphatic reason why it should not become a part of the Constitution. If this passes, we have a Constitution presenting the ridiculous spectacle of guaranteeing the right of franchise to the negro in one section and effectually taking it away in another. But apart from this inconsistency and incongruity, I do not believe we should indorse or permit any act looking to the disfranchisement of this great multitude that is making such great progress in political ability and industrial life.

Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose any academic discussion can or will change a vote on this question. The majority are for this section, and they do not propose to give us an opportunity to eliminate it. Indulgently they permit us to talk about it for a little time, but amend it—never! A few days ago, at the beginning of this Congress, we were led to believe the halcyon days had come. Then the leaders on that side, with words that fell with sweet cadence upon our ears, promised that during this Congress full freedom of debate should be extended and every opportunity for amendment granted. Here we have the measure of their performance. A proposition as important as any that will come before this Congress is suddenly thrust upon us, no opportunity given to investigate or consider the far-reaching effect of its imperfectly understood provisions, and we are told to swallow it whole, instantly, keeping from choking if we can.

While I am reluctant to vote for that feature of the resolution I have just mentioned, the importance of the resolution as a whole is so great that I am heartily in its support. This proposed amendment to the Constitution illustrates and effectuates political evolution in the United States. The wisdom of the fathers has often been commented upon because they gave to the country a great Constitution. This credit is their due. They were somewhat skeptical of the ability of the general mass of people to act intelligently and patriotically in things political, but this was due largely to the fact that Anglo-Saxon democracy had not been given a trial and historical precedent was lacking. But political evolution in this country has corrected the errors, in this regard, committed by the fathers. They thought the average man could not vote intelligently for President, so they introduced the college of electors. But for many decades the electoral college has been a pure fiction, and in effect each citizen now votes directly for President. Those fathers also thought it wise to take the selecting of Senators from the people and place that power in the hands of the legislatures of the several States. In recent years we find the legislatures of many States bound by law to carry out the will of the people as expressed in a primary election to choose a United States Senator. This evolution indicates that all political power belongs to the people; that our people can exercise it; and, what is more, propose to exercise it. You can no more change this great law of political evolution than you can change a law of nature.

This evolution of 130 years has shown that the power of election of all representatives of the people in each and every department of the Government should remain with the people who are to be served. If they make a mistake, the mistake is theirs, and they have a right to make it. The election by direct vote of the people tends to effectuate what we may term a pure republican form of government of the representative character conceived many hundred years ago and first brought forth and perfected on the American continent.

I hope that we will pass this by as large and nearly a unanimous vote as possible, to show to the country that the Members of this body on each side of the aisle are advocates of a progressive political theory that shall preserve and keep to the people, where it belongs, every fundamental power of a political nature. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, during the course of this debate but two objections have been suggested to the passage of this resolution. The first is a puny plea in abatement. It is claimed by some gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber that there is an undue haste in presenting and considering this measure.

The answer to that statement is found in the fact that every Member of this body understands fully the provision now under consideration. It was thoroughly threshed out and discussed by the Judiciary Committee of the body at the other end of the Capitol, and discussed at great length in that body. Every Member here understands its true import, and there is no necessity or excuse for delay.

I must confess, gentlemen on this side of the Chamber, that it is somewhat gratifying to me to know that the chairman of this committee and the committee having this joint resolution in charge have so promptly and so speedily responded to the demand of the public, which the Republican Party has been dilatory in responding to and has refused to recognize for many years. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The other objection urged to this measure on that side by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PICKETT] and the gentleman from Illinois, the ex-Speaker of the House of Representatives [Mr. CANNON], namely, that the Federal Government in the adoption of the amendment now proposed is abrogating the power of self-perpetuation and encouraging a spirit of secession, is equally unfounded. I wonder if the gentleman from Illinois, in his efforts to maintain the power of State legislatures to elect Members of the United States Senate, recalls the fact that every State that ever attempted to go out of the Union did so through the passage of an ordinance of secession by its legislature?

Each House will still be the judge of the election returns and qualifications of its own Members if this amendment is finally ratified. That provision of the Constitution is not affected directly by this joint resolution. The manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives can not fairly be said to involve the perpetuity of the Federal Government, nor can any action of the States in that regard diminish the fundamental powers delegated in the Constitution to the Federal Government. This objection seems to be far-fetched, and from a practical standpoint is of no great importance. If the people of the various States are to exercise the power of electing their Senators, no reason appears why the Congress should reserve the right to make or alter the regulations prescribed by the people themselves for the exercise of that power. The power of Congress to make or alter regulations by the States for the election of Members of Congress, if sought to be eliminated by the proposed amendment, has never appeared to be necessary for the preservation of the National Government nor indispensable to the exercise of its powers. "Force" bills, Federal election laws, in the light of history, have contributed nothing of value to the administration of the Government and have always proved distasteful. If the people can be trusted to elect their Senators by popular vote, as appears to be the consensus of opinion, it would seem not improper to provide that they may determine the manner of the election.

I want to suggest to gentlemen that the day for "force" bills has passed; that there is in no part of this Republic the possibility of the development of any spirit of secession; that issue has long been settled. For the sake of consistency it is well to write into the Constitution with respect to the election of Senators a provision similar to that which exists concerning the election of the President of the United States. The Constitution gives to the legislatures of the States the power to fix the manner of selecting presidential electors, and the only limitation upon that power is that—

> The Congress may determine the time of choosing the electors and the day on which they shall give their votes, which day shall be the same throughout the United States.
> Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislature thereof may direct, a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress—

And so forth.

You can trust the people to elect a President. Every one concedes the fact that the election of presidential electors is practically an election of the President by the people. Do you want to deny to the people of the States full power to choose their Senators?

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I believe that this resolution ought to be adopted for four general reasons.

First. It will increase the power of the people. This, to me, is of primary and paramount importance. If any reason ever existed for requiring that United States Senators be elected by legislatures and not by popular vote that reason has long since disappeared. If our political history demonstrates one fact more clearly than any other, it is the conclusion that abuses are more certainly averted and good government more surely promoted by the recognition in practice of the principle that the people are the source of all political power and may be trusted to exercise it.

Second. The adoption of this resolution, and the consequent election of United States Senators by popular vote, will make the legislative branch of the Government, including the body at the other end of the Capitol, fairly responsive to the public will. When any question of legislative policy has been agitated and the voters of a State have reached a conclusion and expressed that conclusion it will no longer be difficult or impossible to induce Members of the body at the other end of this Capitol to yield to the public demand for reforms in legislation.

Third. The deadlocks which have so often occurred during recent years in the selection of United States Senators, and the consequent detriment to the public, can not happen if this resolution is passed and ratified by the States. I need not recount the many instances that emphasize the importance of this suggestion. That a State may be denied representation in the Senate by reason of the failure of its legislature to elect a Senator has long discredited the prevailing system of electing Senators.

Fourth. The shameful and disgraceful practices occurring in some of the State legislatures in the selection of United States Senators will be terminated if the power to choose Senators is exercised directly by the voters. That bribery and various forms of corruption should have become frequent, not to say common, in the present method of electing Senators is of itself sufficient to discredit the prevailing method and to encourage us to seek and adopt a system which, it is hoped, will be free from such abuses.

The time has come when this amendment will receive the hearty approval of nearly all the States. It will not, of course, relieve the election of Senators from all corrupt influences, but it will place it directly in the power of the voters to choose Senators who are in accord with the spirit of the times and who will give emphasis to the recognized and enlightened view of the voters.

The day of "government by superior people" has passed. Every public citizen will still have and exercise the power of asserting his views and of seeking to mold sentiment on political questions. The passage of this amendment will no more deprive Senators of the privilege of leading in reforms or of opposing improvident and ill-considered measures than does the election of Congressmen deprive Members of this body of that right and power. It will, however, diminish obstinacy and prevent the obstruction of needed legislation, and thus bring the Senate closer to the people.

If the voters are to have the power of governing the country, if legislative policies are to be fixed by an enlightened public opinion and not by selfish interests, it is necessary that both branches of Congress be fairly responsive to the public will and directly responsible to the people. The passage of legislation, however much desired by one body, results in nothing if defeated in the other. This frequently occurs now, but it will not happen so often if this amendment is ratified.

In this great Republic, employing many thousands of persons, Members of this body, the Members of the House of Representatives, are the only elective officers. In the course of progress the people of the United States have reached the conclusion that Members of the other legislative body ought also to be elected.

I, for one, am in favor of giving the people that power, and in favor of giving them the power without reservation, because they can exercise it much more skillfully and much better for the Government than it is now exercised. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, stripped of all its verbiage and all its frills this joint resolution amending the United States Constitution, as we are all aware, allows the people to elect their Senators by the popular vote rather than have the various legislatures select them. No gentleman on the opposite side, and no one disposed to oppose this measure, has said that it would not accomplish that purpose. Until such a charge is made we must assume that the opposition is but fanciful rather than real. The opponents of this reform have objected to this particular verbiage and to that, but no opponent of the measure and no one who has even partially favored it has said that it would not accomplish election of Senators by the people. The venerable ex-Speaker CANNON, who announced that he would not support this resolution, did not say it would not accomplish the purpose, but he objected to something relative to the particular language used. I for one am heartily in favor of this resolution as it stands, because it accomplishes what 90 per cent, nay, I believe, 99 per cent, of the people desire. I congratulate the chairman of the committee and the committee itself that they have caused this to be the first bill reported by a Democratic committee. I will wait until the adjournment today to congratulate this Democratic House on this being the first bill that it passed. I think it is a beautiful tribute to the House of Representatives, I think it is a beautiful tribute to the American people, I believe it is a beautiful compliment to the Democratic Party to pass as their first bill a bill so universally desired. [Applause.]

My friends, in looking over the report I am sorry to find a minority report signed by a Republican Member of this House from the thirty-second district of New York. I am sorry that he assigns only the insufficient reason, which in substance is that he is opposed to it fundamentally. I can not consistently attribute that same view to all of the minority of this House, because many of them have asserted their fealty and their willingness to support it; but I can not but pause for a moment to suggest that it is but a continuation of their 16 years of dilatory tactics in refusing to give this legislation to the American people. I can not but call attention to the fact that for 16 long years the Republican Party have been in full control of both the House, the Senate, and the Chief Executive, and through all those years, with full power invested in them, they have refused to enact it into law. Each of them on the stump and each of them in person can assign reasons, but to the absolute failure to act there can be no valid reason that the people will accept. Men are known better by what they do than by what they say. Political parties are likewise known better by what they do than by what they say. And I might be severe enough to suggest that men sometimes walk one way and look the other. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They sometimes assert they are in favor of the principle involved, but are always found opposing, by reason of some minor detail unworthy and insufficient, to defeat a great principle. And when we observe the bickerings and parliamentary tactics of the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber we can not but think this is such a case.

The question of right to select Senators by a popular vote is not a new one. Strong men advocate that they be so elected in the Constitutional Convention of 1789. At that time such a group of States as this was not dreamed of, and no one with the most exuberant expectations could have dreamed that such ever would be the case. In 1789 a handful of poor, struggling settlers, to-day a Republic of whom the whole world points with pride and esteem. To-day 92,000,000 of liberty-loving American citizens asking for this right. To-day I am proud to find a Democratic House, charged with power to act for the people and in their interests, passing this as their first bill.

We stand before the people at election time and solicit their support and at the same time their confidence. We are elected only after both have been acquired. Then, why should not it be a matter indeed refreshing to find a Congress willing to do the things that they promised the people they would do? For 16 long years the Republicans have trifled with the people's confidence and esteem. For 16 years, with full power to act, they have swept aside the people's wishes as heresies and vagaries, until to-day the party of Lincoln and McKinley has become a by-word in the streets, and their retirement at the recent election is but evidence that the people longer refuse to be trifled with.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] complains of corrupt States and the evil effects that would follow if this bill passed in its present form. Can it be that any State in all this Republic is more corrupt than the legislature elected by a corrupt State? Is he not mistaken in his premises when he predicates an argument on so flimsy a foundation? Is he even misleading himself with any argument so flimsy and so unfounded? Corruption is found less often among American homes than it is around legislatures, and none can gainsay the truth of this assertion.

Recent disclosures in the legislatures have been appalling to us all. Recent disclosures have not alone blighted the names of the corrupt participants, but have reached out and blasted the fair names of whole States in which they conduct their nefarious deals, made possible only by a system so antequated and so unworthy as the election of Senators by the legislatures of the States as distinguished by the patriotic people of the several States.

I can never think this Republic will long stand after we fail to trust the people who pay the taxes in time of peace and shoulder their muskets in time of pestilence and war. I can never think it less safe to trust all the people of any State than it is to trust a few of the same people of the same State. I shall never subscribe to such a theory, in office or out. I shall never be a party to any dilatory tactics practiced by the Republicans in this House to delay action on a question so fundamentally correct. I shall never quibble over details when the accomplishment of a great principle is at stake.

The Democratic Party has repeatedly declared for this principle in convention assembled, and each platform since my early youth has borne pledges to the people of its enactment into law.

I rejoice and rejoice thrice and thrice again that this Congress during the very first days of its interesting session is going to make this much-needed reform a reality. It is but the keeping of faith with the people, and they are entitled to it. It will purify elections. It will bring wholesome results to State and Nation. There are other features of legislation that we have promised the people, and they will follow. It may be asserted that it will fail in the Republican Senate, and it may; but behind it all the people will know who their friends are, and will also know where the trouble has been these long years. It is my belief, if the Senators were elected by the people so that at each returning campaign the candidates for Senator would have to return to their people and get the indorsement and acquaintance of their people, there would be less unwillingness to enact laws that all of the people want. Close contact with the people can only be acquired by forcing the candidate to consult them. Close acquaintance can not be exacted unless the power is vested in the people to punish or reward. When the power is vested in the legislatures of the States, the candidate does not have to proceed further than to acquaint himself with the few members of the legislature to further hold his seat, and the people receive little or, at least, inferior consideration from him. I rejoice to see the people coming into their own, and they are eminently entitled to it. It is not more than they should ask. It is but common justice. It will result in nought but good.

It is charged by opponents of the measure that it is revolutionary and socialistic. I deny it, and it is not borne out by the facts. It is common justice and common sense. It is but the doing of exact justice to a people who have long been denied that right to select their Members of Congress in both branches.

Since I came to Congress I have each session introduced a joint resolution for the election of Senators by the popular vote. I have a bill pending now, and if this bill fails in a Republican Senate, I shall reintroduce each session as long as I am here, and at each occasion, like "Banquo's ghost," I will appear on the scene until it becomes the law of the land and a part of the American Constitution.

The American people have said you shall not barter away their rights by men they did not elect, and you shall not defeat this legislation without the protest and the knowledge of the people who are wronged by the defeat.

It is charged that none but the rich can afford to run for the Senate if popular election is exacted of them by the people. It is not so. Senators are elected for six years, three times the length of the time for which the House Members are chosen, and there is no occasion for the application of such a rule or such a statement. Again it may be said that it is of equal importance that Senators be as near to the people as the more numerous branch of Congress, for each bill and each resolution has to pass both bodies before it becomes a law. I submit for one branch to be responsive and the other inactive and irresponsive to the will of the people is almost as deplorable as if both branches were selected otherwise than by the people.

Power begets respect. The absence of power without exception makes respect at best more tardy and usually totally absent. The people should have the power in the abstract, but surely they should have it when it begets for them the respect the Constitution intended them to have.

Pass this joint resolution and you make no mistake. Pass the resolution and the States will act at their first sitting.

Pass this resolution and the American people will see we intend to keep the faith when in power that we advocated when not in power. Pass this resolution and make responsive that body which is too far removed from the aches and pains of the people. Pass it and endear yourselves to the people of all political faiths and enact a reform from which no ill effects can emanate. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. I should like to have unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman allow me to make a statement?

Mr. FERRIS. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to state that at this time I will not object, but I put the House on notice that hereafter no speeches not delivered and no extension of remarks will be printed in the RECORD in the Sixty-second Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I desire to ask the gentleman from Florida if this rule is to be applied to everyone hereafter?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. MANN. I understand the gentleman from Florida proposes to object to all requests hereafter.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. After to-day; yes.

Mr. MANN. Well, I will begin now. I will object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this question is important and a great many gentlemen on both sides, I am informed, desire to express their views briefly who will not have a chance to consume time on the floor, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of this House, whether they have been recognized or not, who desire to express their views on this great question may be permitted to do so within five legislative days, their remarks to be confined to the subject matter of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that all Members desiring to print remarks in the RECORD on this question may have five legislative days in which to do so. Is there objection?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I hope no gentleman will object.

Mr. SHERLEY. Reserving the right to object, I should like to suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that his request be modified by the statement that the RECORD shall show that the speech is printed under leave.

Mr. KENDALL. I hope the gentleman will agree to that.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the gentleman that there has been an abuse in the past in regard to leave-to-print speeches in the RECORD. Now, it is manifest that we must either have much more discussion, or else relief must be given through leave to print in the RECORD; but it seems to me proper that there should be something in the RECORD to indicate that the speech is printed under leave.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from Kentucky, let me say, I believe it would be well to enforce the rule with rigor as applicable to mere political essays written into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but this is not that. But it is not that. This is a great question, not partisan, and it affects all people alike. It has its ardent advocates on one side of the Chamber as well as the other. I do not believe anybody in reference to this particular question ought to have the rule enforced against it.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I shall insist that the speeches shall be germane to the resolution.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. That was my request, and I so stated.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have made every effort possible to get sufficient time for actual discussion upon the proposed amendment to the Constitution. Now, is it the purpose to insert a lot of speeches in the RECORD to make it appear that we had full discussion on the subject?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has not forgotten that, standing quite close to him and making some demonstration, I asked if they wanted two hours or four hours or a day for general debate on that side.

Mr. MANN. Four hours is a day, and we took all the time we could get.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I am speaking of a day from the standpoint of 12 hours.

Mr. MANN. Oh, but the gentleman said that he proposed to close general debate and pass this bill to-day.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen will bear me witness that I said we were going to pass the bill to-day, and I should ask for the previous question if we could not agree on a time for general debate.

Mr. MANN. Well, I am not going to object, and I will withdraw the objection that I heretofore made, because I think it will look better for us even if we fake in the RECORD an apparent consideration of an amendment to the Constitution which was actually refused in the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object to what has been denominated fake speeches, I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Missouri to amend his request for unanimous consent to this effect—that the time for this debate be extended one hour on each side, and if at the expiration of that time all gentlemen have not been heard on this side or that, the request can be renewed. On this side gentlemen are only taking five minutes. That is as much time as I desire to have, and I do not desire to put any fake speech in the RECORD.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the time was agreed upon for general debate at the suggestion, as I understood it, of the gentleman from Michigan. Now, I say to him that if he desires to extend the debate for one hour or two hours, if he will indicate it, I will ask for unanimous consent.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I should be very glad, Mr. Speaker, to agree with the gentleman to extend the time of debate two hours, if satisfactory to him and the House.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Two hours on each side?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. One hour on each side.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Let me understand, there is a good deal of confusion. I ask the gentleman from Michigan how much time does he ask to extend general debate?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. In view of the general demand for debate about me, I will ask for two hours on each side.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate on this resolution be extended two hours on each side.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas objects. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that all Members have the privilege of printing speeches in the RECORD on this proposed amendment for five legislative days. Is there objection?

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to inquire of the gentleman from Missouri what is the objection to the suggestion advanced by the gentleman from Kentucky designating the fact in the speech that it was not delivered, but inserted in the RECORD by leave?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection whatever, but I understood from audible utterances all around me that there was objection.

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to say that I do not believe it is a proper thing to inject that sort of system in the RECORD at this time.

Mr. KENDALL. Does the gentleman think it is a proper thing to inject a speech in the RECORD without having made it on the floor?

Mr. FOSTER of Illinois. If it is proposed to put that statement in the RECORD I shall object myself.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, pending this matter, objection having been made to extending the general debate for two hours on a side, I would ask the gentleman from Missouri to ask unanimous consent to extend the debate one hour on each side.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend general debate one hour on each side, the time to be divided equally.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend general debate one hour on each side, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri and the other by the gentleman from Michigan. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to renew my request that all gentlemen have five legislative days in which to print remarks on this proposed amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that five legislative days be allowed in which Members may print remarks in the RECORD upon this proposed amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I shall not at this time object, because it has been a custom long indulged in, but I think the House can well afford to make the RECORD a real journal of the proceedings here, and I shall undertake in some proper way to have such a rule adopted.

It is proper that men who do not have an opportunity to express their views on the floor should have a medium of presenting them to the country, but it is not proper that they should be presented under false pretenses. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CARY].

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of the amendment to elect the United States Senators by a direct vote of the people, and I am heartily in favor of another amendment which I believe is just as important, and perhaps more important, at least of as much importance, as the election of the United States Senators by a direct vote of the people, and for that reason I ask in my time to present the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read:

The Clerk read as follows:

That there be, and there is hereby, proposed the following amendment to the Constitution, which, when ratified as the Constitution prescribes, shall become and be effective as part of the Constitution, as follows:

"SEC. 1. Members and Delegates to the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States shall be elected, after the passage of this bill, for a term of four years.

"SEC. 2. Said election shall take place at the time and on the day prescribed by law for the casting of the popular vote for President of the United States, and in the manner prescribed by law by the different States and Territories."

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker, I introduce this because I think it is as important as a direct vote for United States Senators. I believe that the fewer elections we have for Congressmen the better for all concerned. You can not sit in Congress and every two years run for office and do justice to the people who send you here. The fact of the matter is, you are in politics all of the time, and you do not have time enough to do justice in two-year terms. For that reason I offer this amendment.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. LAFFERTY].

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, it must be very apparent to gentlemen on the other side of the House by this time that a great many Members who are sincerely in favor of the election of Senators by a direct vote of the people have some objection to the resolution in the form in which it is presented. If you gentlemen on the other side of the House are earnestly, honestly, and sincerely in favor of bringing about this great reform, to wit, the election of the United States Senators by a direct vote of the people, it behooves you to assert your independence upon the roll call upon the issue that is now presented, and send this resolution to the legislatures of the several States in such form that it will be adopted. It is plain to everyone that a great majority of the Members in this House favor the election of Senators by a direct vote of the people. We all know that a great majority of the citizens of this country are in favor of that reform, and would so express themselves if they had an opportunity to vote upon it, but I do not believe that a majority of the people of the United States would vote for the Federal Congress to surrender absolutely the power that it now has and has always maintained, to prescribe, if needs be, how Members of the lower and upper Houses of Congress should be elected.

I come from the State of Oregon, a State that stands out preeminently in favor of the direct election of the Senators. In fact, we are so strongly impressed with this belief and so strongly in favor of this reform that we have adopted in our State a direct primary, whereby we have provided that each party shall nominate a candidate for United States Senator at the primary, and that the candidate so nominated shall be placed upon the ballot at the general election and voted for by the people.

The primary law of Oregon further provides that candidates for the legislature may, if they choose, subscribe to either statement No. 1 or statement No. 2, statement No. 1 being that the candidate pledges himself to the people of his district and the people of his State that if elected he will always vote in the election for Senator for that candidate who shall have received the highest number of the people's votes at the last preceding election. It has come to pass, after six years of trial of that system, that no man can be elected to the legislature who does not sign statement No. 1.

Therefore I am not only personally favorable to this resolution, which has been under the peculiar circumstances presented by a Democratic House, but my constituents are in favor of it. I want to see it become a part of the Constitution of the United States. I am not here playing politics upon the Republican side of this Hall. I am here acting independently. I am here, as some have said, as an insurgent Republican. I am against machine rule. [Applause.] I shall vote for every proposed law that I believe ought to be passed during my service here, whether it comes from a Democratic or a Republican source. The Oregon system of electing all officers by the people and nominating all candidates for office by the people breeds independence, and it breeds insurgents. The reason why the people of the United States want the direct election of Senators is that it makes United States Senators accountable directly to the public for their election, the same as Representatives here are accountable to the public for their election. When the time comes that Senators are elected by the people, the people will get the legislation that they are entitled to, that they are demanding; and if you gentlemen over there want the legislatures of the several States to approve this amendment, then vote to cut out this part of your proposed amendment which takes away from the Federal Government the power of supervision.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] 10 minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I shall not discuss the main proposition involved in this resolution, because I hope and believe it will receive the unanimous vote of this House. [Applause.] I do wish to discuss for a moment, however, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG]. The resolution as reported from the committee deprives the Federal Government of any power to regulate the time and manner of holding elections. It does more than that. Through the insertion of a word of two letters, the word "as," it also changes the present Constitution, so that there is no duty laid upon any State to prescribe the time and manner of holding elections. Under the Constitution as it exists to-day it provides that the legislature shall prescribe the time and manner and places of holding elections, and also reserves to the Federal Government the power to alter and amend such regulations. This amendment, however, as reported from the committee, contains this language: "The time, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be," not prescribed, but "as prescribed," therefore imposing no duty upon the legislature to prescribe the time and manner at all. Now, I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan for this reason: The right to elect Senators by the people will be of little value to any State unless there shall also accompany that the right to nominate the men who are voted for at the polls. There are many States in this Union to-day—I need not undertake to mention them—where this amendment to the Constitution will be of little value, because special interests will nominate in both political parties the candidates for the United States Senate, and the people will be compelled to choose between two, neither of whom will be representative of them. If this right was reserved to control the elections by the Federal Government, if this amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan shall be adopted, that right can be guaranteed to the people of every State—the right to nominate as well as elect.

It would be entirely practicable and feasible for this Congress to pass a primary law providing for the nomination of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives providing that that law shall be operative only in States where direct nominations have not been provided for by their State legislatures, and, further, that it shall cease to be operative whenever any State by its legislature provides for the direct nomination of these officials. But under this resolution as it comes from the committee and as you propose to adopt it to-day it will be absolutely impossible for the Federal Government or this Congress to ever pass such a law in the future, and is there any gentleman upon that side of the House who would not be in favor of that kind of a law, who would not be in favor of direct nomination of Senators and Representatives in Congress as well as their election; and yet you are deliberately depriving the Congress of the power to secure to the people that right of directly nominating as well as directly electing. I understand, of course, the fear upon the part of the gentlemen upon that side of the House of the Federal Government controlling the elections in certain portions of our country, perhaps interfering with the legislative restrictions that would be cast around the ballot, but I wish to remind you that that is fully safeguarded in the resolution as it comes from your committee and is not touched in any way by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan. The resolution provides that the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors in the most numerous branch of the State legislature, and that will remain as it is, and if the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan is adopted Congress will have no power to change in any way these State laws with reference to who shall be entitled to vote for United States Senators.

Are you asking anything more than that, and are you afraid of anything else than that? I believe that if this committee that has reported this bill had considered the matter fully, and especially had considered the suggestion that I make as to the nomination of Senators by the different political parties, as well as their election, they, too, and this House, would have been in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan. [Applause.]

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people. I think the time has come when the Senators should be as responsive to the public will as the Members of the House are. The people of the United States justly believe that the Senators are not now responsive to the public will. The resolution, as reported from the committee over which the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] presides, is not complete, and I regret very much to discover in the reading of it that it excludes the Congress of the United States from the privilege of regulating the method of electing United States Senators. It seems to me that the Congress should retain the power to regulate the election of the men to this office. It should control the power to perpetuate itself. It should not leave to the States the right to make such laws as they choose on a question that involves the integrity of the country. States may have different interests than the country may have as a whole, and the Congress should always be in control. I regret that we are not to be able to vote for a bill which gives that right to the Congress.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. As I understand the gentleman, he is in favor of the resolution but opposed to that feature of it which takes away from Congress the power to regulate.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. This Constitution has been in operation for more than a century. Has the Federal Government ever attempted to control or regulate the election of Senators by reason of that power?

Mr. MADDEN. That is no reason, however, why the Government should have the power to control taken away from it, and the very fact that it has not exercised it should not be a reason why it should not have the power to exercise it.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Does not the gentleman believe that, in view of what we know, historically at least—and none of us know anything about it personally—and what we know of the methods by which Senators are sometimes elected, and of deadlocks existing all over the country, and that the Federal Government has not in a hundred years exercised its powers, it is about time the people should begin to exercise it?

Mr. MADDEN. I believe the people should exercise the power. I believe that delegating to the people the power to elect Senators in Congress would prevent deadlocks. I believe the power should be taken away from the legislatures to elect Senators. The people are best qualified to elect the men to represent them, and the men representing them in any legislative branch of the Government, whether in the Senate or in the House, or in the legislatures of the various States, ought to be responsive to the public will; and the time has come when the people of the United States are going to insist upon the enactment of a law which will give them jurisdiction over their own servants.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE].

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, Abraham Lincoln, the greatest man Illinois ever gave to the Nation or to the world, said: "This is a government of the people, for the people, and by the people." He implicitly trusted in the plain people of this country. We on this side of the House, who believe in him and in his utterances, can safely trust this question to the people of this country. True it is that the fathers saw fit to put the provision in the Constitution as it now exists. That constitutional convention which finally adopted this great instrument was presided over by the greatest man this country ever gave to the world, George Washington, who acted as president of the constitutional convention, and deputies, representing 12 States of the Union, signed and approved this Constitution.

Here is a provision to amend that Constitution. I am in favor of the election of Senators by the people. I so voted years ago as a member of the Illinois Legislature. Every time that question has been presented in this body I have so voted.

I regret exceedingly that the movers of this amendment have seen fit to strike out these words:

> But the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations except as to the places of choosing Senators.

They leave in this resolution these words:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

There are to-day 46 States in the Union. Two more are knocking at the door, making 48. This provision allows 48 States to provide 48 different times, 48 different places, and 48 different manners of holding elections for Senators of the United States, without limiting in the slightest degree any power vested in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. PRINCE. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman says this will permit elections at 48 different times in 48 different places. How will he help that?

Mr. PRINCE. We can control it by limiting the manner, by limiting it except as to the places of choosing Senators. As to that we are forbidden. As to the time and place, this modifies it.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. PRINCE. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that I hardly have the time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. PRINCE. What have we? This body here, made up of 392 men, comes from the body of the people. Yonder body comes from the body of the people through the selectmen. We propose to have the other body selected by the same class of people as that which selects this body.

Where do they come from? From the people. Why should we say that this body and another body coming from the body of the people shall not have the right by law to make or alter such regulations except as to the places of choosing Senators? The power comes from the people. The power of this House comes from the people. We are amenable to them. We go back to them. The other body will also be amenable to the people of the United States, and I am frank to say that I believe the people will make fewer mistakes in the selection of Senators than perhaps the interests of this country have made in the selection of Senators. For that reason I favor the amendment, and if I can not get that, I will favor the resolution.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that gentlemen are unnecessarily alarmed about the provisions of this bill. In the first place, I call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that under the present Constitution it is utterly impossible——

A MEMBER. Louder!

Mr. SISSON. That is the first time that request was ever made of me in my life. [Laughter.] I call the attention of gentlemen to the fact that under the present Constitution Congress has no right to regulate who shall vote for the various members of the State legislature or the State senate. Therefore the States have under the present Constitution the right to provide for the election of their own legislatures in their own way, provided they do not violate any provision of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Federal Constitution. That power is sacred, and ought to be sacred to all the States. That power is necessary to the small States like Rhode Island. It is necessary to all the States, like Maine, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts, because in yonder body they can protect and defend themselves from the strong representation that comes from the more populous and larger States. It was upon that idea that this power should live and be a vital thing and have a vital force in these smaller States that the Constitution was framed. Otherwise you never could have formed this great Government. The smaller States would never have consented to the compact. Why? Because in the House of Representatives as the large States increased in population their power correspondingly increased in the House, and relatively the smaller States would have less power. As new States are carved out of the vast territory west of the small States the power of the small State would be less effective in the Senate to control Federal legislation. It was therefore not only put in the Constitution at the instance of the small States—the provision that no State should be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate without its own consent—but it was nowhere permitted in the Constitution that Congress could regulate the election of State officers; and since the power to elect Senators is placed in the various State legislatures Congress could not in any way reach the State elector or his right to vote for a State senator or representative.

Now, under this provision in this amendment it does just exactly that thing. It does no more than that. It is intended to do no more than that. It is intended that the qualifications of the State electors, when they go to vote directly for a Senator, shall be exactly what their qualifications would be if they voted for a State legislator, who, as the constitution now is, votes for a Senator because he is in the legislature of the State. Now, if you permit the authority in Article I, section 4, of the Constitution to be extended to the power that elects United States Senators, and if that power is the people, then, to leave Article I, section 4, as it is, you take away from the electors of the small States the right to send their Senators to the United States Senate with the State integrity absolutely secure from congressional interference. Senator LODGE—I believe it is against a rule of the House to call the name of a Senator—made a very strong speech, the strongest that has been made upon that proposition, that this was a direct blow at the doctrine of State sovereignty and the integrity of the State. Now, the amendment under consideration was intended to meet that objection and for the purpose of preserving the integrity of the State, and enabling each and every State to elect its own Senators by those who are qualified under their own State laws and constitutions. But if election laws could be written and prescribed by Congress, it would deprive the smaller States of that protection which they now enjoy and the safeguard which is now thrown around them. For example:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

Under the present law it does not matter what sort of regulations this Congress may make in referring to the manner of electing the Senators by the legislatures of the States. They do not and can not under the Constitution interfere with the present election laws of the States, which prescribe the qualifications of the electors for the various branches of the State legislature.

But if this clause is permitted to remain in the Constitution just as it is now, and Senators are elected by the people, then you would extend the power of Congress so that it could do with the Senators what it now does with the House of Representatives, to wit, it might prescribe election laws that differ with the election laws of the various States, and might enlarge or reduce the suffrage in each State in accordance with the wisdom of Congress. It is for that very reason that Article I, section 4, was modified by the distinguished Senator who prepared the proposed amendment. A Republican Senator of distinction prepared this bill with a great deal of care, in order that it might maintain the Government of the United States in its exact form, reserving to all the States the equal power which they now have, and not depriving the States of that power.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Even if the amendment which I have proposed should be adopted, would not the resolution contain this language?—

> The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

And if that be true, how can the United States interfere with the qualifications of electors of the State and reduce the number?

Mr. SISSON. That is the Constitution as it now is; but if you leave section 4 of Article I just as it is—

> But the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators—

That can only affect the body which now has the power to elect, which is the State legislature. The sovereign State now has the sole right to determine who shall vote for the Members of the various branches of the legislature.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. And they would still have it.

Mr. SISSON. No; they would not. The power of election of United States Senators is now lodged in a delegated body in the State, the State legislature, and that delegated body in the State having the power to elect is the only thing that could be regulated by Congress under the present Constitution. The power to regulate does not reach back to the suffrage that elects the members of the various branches of the legislature of the several States.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. SISSON. I do.

Mr. SHERLEY. Perhaps a reply to the question asked by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] may be found in this fact, that the amendment would give to the Congress of the United States control over the manner of holding elections, and while it could not determine what were the qualifications of electors, could not fix the qualifications of electors in regulating the manner of holding the election, it could pass upon the question as to who came within the qualifications as fixed by the State; and by having the power to determine whether a given individual did or did not come within the State qualifications, the Federal law might be able to override the State law; and that position was admitted by Senator ROOT.

Mr. SISSON. I thank the gentleman from Kentucky, who states the position that I take more clearly than I can state it, because he is always clear on every proposition.

Now, I want to call your attention to another thing. No member of any State delegation here ought to be afraid to trust the people of his State.

This Government is no better than the States. You can not make this Government any better than the States. You can not make a good government out of States that are themselves corrupt and bad. You can not make out of it any better Government than the States make themselves. Now, under the present law the great trouble is that the election of a United States Senator overshadows the State election. The qualifications of the various candidates for the State legislatures are lost sight of, and we vote for or against a man because he favors or does not favor a certain man for the United States Senate.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. SISSON. I thank the gentleman. Now, in those States where they have no primary election law, but have nominating conventions, the nominating convention in the county and senatorial districts will be controlled in the interest of a certain candidate for a United States Senator. Therefore we would, if we could, have election laws so that a man would vote for a State legislator or for a member of the State senate upon his qualifications for that particular office, and not because he has a preference for a certain candidate for the United States Senate. Each State must have the right, which it now has, of electing its own State officers in its own way, without disturbing in the least the integrity of the State in its own election laws. How much better it would be if, in addition to this, we could elect Senators directly, so that our State legislators would be elected on their merit, and not because they are for or against a certain candidate for the Senate. But any resolution that receives my support must be one which will not permit Congress to pass a law to supervise elections in a State.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. KENDALL. The power now resides in Congress to have a general supervision over the membership, and it has never been abused in the history of the country, has it?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not want my distinguished friend to put it up to me to answer that question.

Mr. KENDALL. I thought that the gentleman would not want to answer it.

Mr. SISSON. If I had time, I would like to tell my distinguished friend from Iowa some facts that would cause him to be uneasy sometimes about partisan control, when passion runs high; but I thank God that that time is passed. This is no time or place to reopen the wounds of the past; they are healed. Let us not even refer to our differences of the past while discussing this great question, which means so much to our great Republic. The day is long since passed when we should inject these questions into our discussions on this floor. My distinguished young friend should not try to do this, and I will not at this time allow him to lead me into a discussion that would tend to revive the old feeling. I thank God that it has gone; and may He never send any more fratricidal strife, but may the dove of peace forever hover around this Capitol, and may we be permitted to discuss these questions apart from those recollections. [Applause.]

I come from that section which has sometimes been charged with being without patriotism and without love for the common country, but I yield to no man in my love and devotion to this Government. I can point with pride to the devotion of the noble people of the South whose faith and love for this Government have been tried in the fires of persecution and the crucible of oppression, and who have been found to be pure gold. We will defend with pride our common country with our lives, and I pledge that every able-bodied man who lives in my section of the country, if need be, will die in defense of our Federal Government. [Applause.]

So let us not go back and dig up any embers of the past in discussing this matter; let us discuss it on its merits. I have confidence in the people of Maine, in the God-fearing, honest people of Vermont and Massachusetts, California and Oregon. I believe these people may be trusted in their integrity and patriotism to do the right thing for the common country, and that our flag will not have a star dimmed in its beauty unless the Federal Government should lay violent hands upon the sovereignty of these States and deprive them of the right to handle their own local questions in their own local way. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER].

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, ever since I have been a Member of this House—going on 17 years—I have advocated and worked faithfully to bring about the election of Senators in Congress by the direct vote of the people. In every Congress in which I have served I have introduced a joint resolution—substantially similar to the joint resolution now under consideration—to amend the Constitution to accomplish this most desirable reform, and the record will show that I have done everything in my power, in Congress and out of Congress, to secure its accomplishment.

Without any vanity I can justly say that I am the author of this reform. On several occasions my resolution has passed the House, only to fail in the Senate, but it is just as sure to be written into our Constitution, sooner or later, as the sun is to rise to-morrow.

I am opposed to delegating away the rights of the people, and where they have been delegated away I would restore them to the people. I trust the people, and I believe in the people. With Jefferson I believe that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, and hence I want to restore to the people the right now delegated to the legislatures by the framers of the Constitution, so that the Senators as well as Members of Congress shall be elected directly by the people, and the Government thus become more and more a representative democracy, where brains, fitness, honesty, ability, experience, and capacity, and not wealth and subserviency, shall be the true qualifications for both branches of the Federal Legislature.

The people all over this country now demand this much-needed change in the Federal Constitution, so that they can vote directly for Senators in Congress, and they appeal to us to enact this law to give them that right. It is not a partisan question, neither is it a sectional issue. The demand reaches us from all parts of the land and from men in all political parties with a degree of unanimity that is quite surprising. It is our duty to respect the wishes of the people and to give them a uniform law allowing them to vote for Senators in Congress just the same as they now vote for Representatives in Congress.

The United States Senate is the last bulwark of the predatory trusts. Here is the citadel of every unscrupulous monopoly. And more and more the special interests of the country, realizing the importance of the Senate, are combining their forces to control the election of Federal Senators through their sinister influence in State legislatures. Forty-six United States Senators can prevent the enactment of a good law or the repeal of a bad law. The United States Senate is the most powerful legislative body in the world, and its Members should be elected by the people of the country just the same as the Representatives in Congress are elected. This is of the utmost importance to every man in the Republic, because when the Senate is directly responsible to the people they will control it; and then, and not till then, will that important legislative body respond to the will of the people.

The right to elect United States Senators by a direct vote of the people is a step in advance and in the right direction. I hope it will speedily be brought about. It is the right kind of reform, and I hope it will be succeeded by others, until this Government becomes indeed the greatest and the best and the freest Government the world has ever seen, where the will of the people shall be, as it ought to be, the supreme law of the land. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY].

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have been deeply impressed by what has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] and by other gentlemen on that side of the Chamber about the sacredness of the Constitution of the United States; about the care and the hesitancy with which we should approach it in any attempt to alter it in any material respect. I am firmly convinced that as eras have produced great explorers or poets or soldiers, so there are times in the affairs of men when great jurists and great statesmen execute an immortal work, not for a single generation, but for all their children and their children's children who are to follow them in the succeeding centuries. I believe that Jefferson and Madison and Hamilton and Washington erected an edifice so perfect in all its details, so beautiful in its structure, so firm and immutable in its foundations, that it shall live through the centuries, and that when nations and languages and empires shall have perished, the Constitution of the United States, still intact and still preserving these institutions under the flag, shall be the wonder and the admiration of all men a thousand years from now. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. Did I understand the gentleman in his eulogy of Washington and Jefferson and Hamilton and Madison and those other great men, to found it largely upon their magnificent work in making the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I did not catch the question.

Mr. COOPER. Did I understand the gentleman when he spoke with such splendor of language and imagery of Washington, of Jefferson, of Hamilton, and Madison, and other great men, that he was at the same time eulogizing or speaking in complimentary terms of their master product, the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. STANLEY. In my feeble way I intended to do so.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman please tell me what Thomas Jefferson had to do with the Constitution? He was not in the convention at all. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I will take pleasure in doing so. The Declaration of Independence itself was the spirit of which the Constitution is the letter. [Applause.] I happen to have here in my desk a letter from Thomas Jefferson to Mr. Madison, and I thought I could lay my hands on it, discussing this very question. It is true that the Sage of Monticello throughout that discussion before the Constitution was written, and after it was written, was consulted by the men who wrote it as an oracle and as a guide. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is true that to Thomas Jefferson more than to any other we owe the Bill of Rights, now in the Constitution, which is in verity the shield and sword to the oppressed of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I would commend to the gentleman to study the life, the writings, and the achievements of Thomas Jefferson. With his splendid intellect, with his broad statesmanship, could he get out of the bog, cease to follow the narrow politicians, and stand for a few months under the effulgence of Jefferson's eloquence and his wisdom, the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin would surely adorn this side of the Chamber. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. With pleasure.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I want the gentleman to understand that my query proceeds from a friendly motive.

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. LAFFERTY. In an endeavor to arrive at a compromise that will be approved by the people and by the legislatures, if possible, I desire to ask if we who are opposed to the surrender of the supervisory power of the Federal Government which has never been exercised, in our opinion, to the detriment of the South, are asking the gentlemen on the other side to surrender or give up anything that they are now entitled to under the Constitution when we ask them to simply be satisfied with a constitutional amendment providing for the direct election of Senators without going further and asking for an additional amendment to the Constitution which destroys its symmetry, which destroys section 4, splits it in twain, and leaves the anomalous condition of the Federal Congress having the authority, if it should ever come to pass that it was proper for it to exercise that authority, to supervise the election of Representatives, and no longer having authority to amend any regulations that may be made in regard to Senators? And I would desire the gentleman now to answer—and I am friendly to the resolution—whether or not it would not be better for the gentlemen on the other side to be satisfied——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman from Kentucky, and forbid anybody interfering with him in that time. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for 10 minutes additional.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would answer the question of my friend from Oregon had he propounded a question. [Laughter.] Now, if all that the gentleman says is true, the only thing that this amendment does is to give to the States the power that it has never exercised in a hundred years and will probably never exercise in the next hundred years.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I would like to ask, Mr. Speaker, why gentlemen on the other side——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Oregon?

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. LAFFERTY. In the same friendly motive, I would ask why gentlemen on the other side object to leaving the Constitution in that regard stand just where it is and be satisfied with an amendment for the direct election of Senators.

Mr. STANLEY. I do not object to leaving the Constitution stay just where it is, and I am of the opinion it will be found in the same locality whether we pass this amendment or not.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit.

Mr. STANLEY. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Perhaps the answer to the gentleman from Oregon might be found in the fact that when you provide for the direct election of Senators by the people, you do then enlarge the power that the Federal Government will have over the power that it now possesses when they are elected by the legislatures of the various States, and it is not possible, as stated by the gentleman, to offer simply an amendment for the direct election of Senators and leave the situation in that particular in statu quo.

Mr. STANLEY. Now, speaking in all seriousness to my friend from Oregon, the founders of the Constitution discussed at great length the wisdom of allowing the States to be represented according to their population in this body and in another body according to their autonomy. Thomas Jefferson, immediately after the passage of the Constitution, wrote to Madison and said that he was delighted with the compromise made between the large and the small States at that time. The manner of the election of United States Senators was a detail which was almost entirely overlooked by the makers of the Constitution. This amendment does not take any power from the Constitution which it now possesses, because over the method of election of United States Senators by the legislatures the Federal Government was absolutely prevented from interfering with their election, not in hæc verba, but from the very nature of things. It is not contended that the Federal Government ever has or ever can interfere——

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Oregon?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I desire to ask the necessity, if there be any necessity, in submitting this constitutional amendment or making any provision for the amending of section 4, which reads:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof, but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations.

Mr. STANLEY. I am speaking to that point right now. The Congress never has and never will interfere with the time, the manner, or the places of selecting Senators under the law as it now exists. Will this Congress ever think of interfering——

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes.

Mr. LAFFERTY. In order to arrive at a decision it is necessary to ask the question—I do not desire to interfere or to be presumptuous in the matter——

Mr. STANLEY. I know it.

Mr. LAFFERTY. I want to ask this question: If Congress has never interfered, there ought not, it seems to me, to be any fear that it ever will; but in the very nature of things it shocks the conscience or the intelligence of a lawyer, as suggested by the able gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL], that Congress should surrender the power of providing for its own perpetuity.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would respectfully suggest to the gentleman that in different language he has asked me the same question four different times.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] declines to yield further.

Mr. STANLEY. I will let the gentleman finish that question.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Since it does appear that there is a division upon that material point between the North and the South, as you understand, as to the surrender of this power, which is not material according to the gentleman's own statement——

Mr. STANLEY. I wish to be patient with the gentleman, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LAFFERTY (continuing). Why burden the amendment with it?

Mr. STANLEY. I desire to be courteous, but I hope to finish this sentence, and I will not have any more time than is necessary to do that. Now, in effect, we are not depriving the Federal Government of any actual power which it now possesses. It could not in the nature of things interfere with the election, by the very wording of the Constitution, of members of the legislature or of Senators. The States have the sole and the absolute right to choose the members of both bodies of the legislature without any interference by the Federal Government. Those members, when elected, in the very nature of things, have the right to fix the manner of the election of United States Senators. The reasons which have led the Federal Government to interfere with the election of Members of this body, being founded upon representation, upon population, there has come, and there may come, a clash between the Federal and the State Governments.

The number of Senators being absolutely fixed by the Constitution, the details of their election being arranged under the Constitution, as it now exists, the Federal Government never could, never has, and never can successfully interfere with a State in the selection of her Senators.

The whole purpose of this amendment is simply to allow the people, acting directly, to exercise their power just as they do now when acting through the members of the legislature.

I favor this amendment because it is a mere detail that the framers of the Constitution could not anticipate. The personnel of the Senate for 50 years after the adoption of the Constitution of the United States shows that Senators then were responsive to and were named by the people. Conditions have changed, both social and industrial, so that it becomes necessary that we should now change the method of electing United States Senators in order that they may be directly responsive to the people and be named by them, as they were in the days when the Constitution was first adopted.

Your fears are unfounded for another reason. You must remember that when the Constitution of the United States was adopted there were two mooted questions, one of which was whether a State was absolutely sovereign, clothed with the right to retire peacefully from this bond of sisterhood.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. STANLEY. I would like one minute more.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman the time he desires in which to finish the sentence.

Mr. STANLEY. The other position was that the States were indestructible. The question of the right of a State to secede has been settled by the arbitrament of war. From that hour until this the indestructibility of the State is the thing that has been in danger. If this Government is ever destroyed, it will be because of the fact that we have become a compact Federal Union, an empire, and not because the States have encroached upon the rights of the Federal Government. Those who would preserve the Union as founded by the fathers need not look with a jealous eye upon the authority of the States as such, but we owe it to ourselves to preserve and encourage the States in exercising to the utmost all of their local authority and preserving inviolate their local autonomy. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I am most heartily in favor of the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people, and there can be no question but that the people of the United States are in favor of electing United States Senators by direct vote of the people. The Democratic Party has stood for this for many years. The Democratic Party in the last three national conventions has passed a resolution declaring that its members were in favor of the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people. The people of the State of California for the last 20 years have been studying and trying in every way possible how they might secure a representation in the United States Senate of their choice, selected by the people and not by the system, and I have presented here a resolution that passed the State Legislature of California in favor of electing Senators of the United States by the people. We in California passed a constitutional amendment giving the State legislature the power to adopt a law so that we may designate our choice by a direct vote of the people, and at the last legislature we succeeded in passing a bill which is, in substance, the law of Oregon, providing that the people might express their will and might put up to their State senators and representatives the question as to how they stand upon that subject of election of United States Senators in order that the voters might vote intelligently and in order that the great body of the people might be represented and know where their representatives stood on this subject before they were elected.

But I want to ask my friends on this side of the House, In what Democratic convention, or at what time, or at what place it has ever been discussed, it has ever been determined as a question of Democratic principle, that we should amend paragraph 1 of section 4 of Article I of the Constitution? [Applause on the Republican side.] At what time have we ever gone before the American people telling them that while we were in favor of electing United States Senators by direct vote of the people, we were in favor of changing that wise provision of the law which gives this Congress the power to supervise the election of Representatives and the election of Senators? [Applause on the Republican side.]

And now I appeal to you, my Democratic friends, and I want you to think before you vote on this side. If we are in good faith, if we are in earnest, if we are determined that this proposed constitutional amendment to the first paragraph of section 3 of Article I shall go to the several States and be adopted, and thereby give the people the right to elect the United States Senators by direct vote, let us put the amendment in the form that has been discussed for the last 20 years by the American people and the form that they stand for. Do not have a rider to it. Do not put something to it that they have never discussed. You know that State after State in this Union may defeat this proposed constitutional amendment that we are so ardent for, that we have prayed so long for, that we have deserved—that we might have it for the purpose of rectifying the wrongs that have been committed, that we might have it for the purpose of giving the people a chance in the United States Senate and dragging from that body the moneybags, and putting men in there who will represent the people and not the system, if we burden it with too many riders. [Applause.] I ask my Democratic friends now——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Will the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] use some of his time now?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to let this opportunity pass without expressing my approval of the principle of the election of United States Senators by the direct vote of the people. I believe now, as I have believed for years, that the Constitution of the United States should be amended so as to permit the electors of the several States to elect the United States Senators by direct vote as they now elect Representatives in Congress. It is unfortunate that the proposed amendment is made objectionable by the provision which takes from Congress the authority, as provided in Article I, section 4, of the Constitution, to control the times and manner of electing Senators, but leaves Congress the authority to control the manner of electing Representatives in Congress. This injects a new question into the proposition, which in the end may defeat the amendment itself. If so, the Democratic majority in this House will be responsible for the defeat of the legislation that is so universally demanded by the people. I shall vote to amend the resolution so as to present the one proposition, allowing the people to vote directly in the election of Senators; but if this amendment shall be lost, I shall then vote for the proposed amendment to the Constitution as it comes from the committee, trusting to the other branch of the Congress to properly amend the proposition so as to make it unobjectionable.

I shall vote for the amendment to the Constitution for the following reasons:

First. Because I believe in so doing I express the will of the great majority of my constituents, and while I remain a Member of this House I shall always feel it my duty to represent my constituents in every vote I cast. I represent a district very evenly divided in politics, and in casting my vote for this measure I believe I express the will of my constituents—Democrats, Socialists, and Republicans alike.

Second. I am in favor of this amendment, because my own judgment approves it. In affairs of our National Government, and especially in legislative matters, I am in favor of the distribution rather than in the concentration of power. I believe it is safer to let all the electors vote on the election of Senators than to limit the number to the very few who may happen to be elected members of the various legislatures.

Third. I believe, on the average, better men will be elected to the United States Senate. By this I do not mean to reflect upon those who have been elected to the Senate under our present system. But under the present system unknown men are often elected to the Senate as so-called "dark horses." If the people elect directly, the men elected will be more apt to be men who have attained great prominence in the State, who have a wide reputation for ability, and who are known for their integrity and high character.

Fourth. In my opinion, the change in the manner of election of Senators will give us, on the whole, better laws and wiser legislation. If we get better men, we will have better laws, because the ability, patriotism, and character of legislators will always be reflected in the laws which they enact.

Fifth. I believe, when elected by a direct vote of the people, Senators will be more responsive to the will of the people. A Senator is elected for a term of six years. To my mind, it seems wise that after six years of service he should go back to his State and submit his record to the electors of his State.

Sixth. In my judgment this change in the manner of electing Senators will tend, at least, toward the purity of the election of Senators. Corrupt methods may be used even when the people shall vote directly, but the danger is not so great, and it is more difficult to corrupt the people constituting the many than to corrupt the legislators constituting the few. There are other reasons that I might give, if I had the time, but my time is limited.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. MORGAN. I should like to have one minute more.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman one minute.

Mr. MORGAN. I believe my colleague [Mr. FERRIS] is not in the Hall of the House at this time. I regret he is not here. In his remarks a few minutes ago he criticized the Republican Party for not enacting this legislation during its long lease of power. I wish to remind the gentleman that it was the Republican State of Oregon that first adopted the legislation that in practice permitted the people to elect their Senators by direct vote, even without any constitutional authority therefor. And that, notwithstanding this example set by the Republican State of Oregon, the Democratic leaders of Oklahoma who controlled the constitutional convention which framed the constitution of the State of Oklahoma, and have controlled by large majorities the legislatures of our State, have failed to give the people of Oklahoma any opportunity to express, at the general election, their choice for United States Senators. This, too, in face of the fact that Republicans have been demanding that the people be given this right.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has again expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, in the time at my disposal I can not hope to add anything to the broad question of the election of Senators by the direct vote of the people. Personally I am in favor of that proposition. It would be academic for me to refer to the principles that were advocated by the framers of the Constitution when the provision which we are considering was drafted into it. The words of Roger Sherman and of Gerry and others of that time indicate that some of them were imbued with the idea that the Senate should be a body that would represent the wealth of this country; that would represent the interests as against the masses of the people; that should be elected by a few because the people dare not be trusted. I shall not argue this point, because I take it that the majority of the Members of this body believe, as I believe, in the intelligence and the responsibility of the people.

I do, however, want to call attention to one or two matters that have arisen this afternoon with respect to the amendments that have been proposed and the substitute that was offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. The gentleman in addressing himself to his substitute, as I understand it, indicated that he was fearful that the language of the proposed constitutional amendment, if adopted, would give to the States the power to provide in any way they might choose for the election of Senators, taking away from the people that which we seek to give to them, the power of electing Senators.

Only a word with respect to that. It seems to me the language in lines 6, 7, and 8 nullifies his argument, because that language is to the effect that the qualifications of electors of Senators shall be those requisite for the "electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures."

And more than that, lines 15, 16, and 17 indicate that that is the meaning of this whole amendment, when the language reads, with respect to the filling of vacancies, that the legislature of any State may empower the executive thereof to make temporary appointments "until the people fill the vacancy by election." Words could hardly be plainer, and I am opposed to the substitute, and pass from its discussion to another point that has been raised, namely, to the question whether or not we shall delegate to the States the power to elect the Senators without the United States Congress exercising control over the manner of the election.

So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the amendment that has been proposed. I believe in passing the amendment to the Constitution, however, in such a manner as will appeal to the most of the States of the Union. If the one manner will appeal to most of them, I am for that manner; if the other manner, I am for that manner, because I believe the reservation to the Congress of the right to control election of Senators is not a vital principle that we need to stumble over. As I see it, the essence of the question is the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people.

I find myself in favor of that proposition, even without congressional control, for two reasons. In the first place, I believe that the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution provide an adequate safeguard of the citizenship of this country, and that in addition to this a sufficient safeguard of our form of government is found in the constitutional guaranty of a republican form of government. In the second place, I find myself in accord with it when I reflect that the people of this country to-day, the people of the several States, have already as great a responsibility upon them as is involved in the election of Senators, and they have proven themselves worthy of the responsibility. For more than a century our people have full well assumed the responsibility involved in the election of governors, the election of supreme courts, the election of Members of this great body, and the determining of the great policies and problems confronting the different Commonwealths, and for that reason I am for the amendment to the Constitution. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, it is well and generally known that this is the most important question concerning our organic law that has come up for consideration and decision since the adoption of the Constitution, and I agree that there is much force in the argument that in so important a matter as destroying the principle upon which the Constitution was founded we should deliberate long and well. The only other amendments to the Constitution have been to secure human rights or to change the mechanism for the election of a President. This amendment changes the Constitution in one of its important principles.

When the Constitution was framed and adopted, its makers were composed of our most able and learned statesmen. They believed at that time that the best plan was to have United States Senators elected by the legislatures of the several States forming the Union. They did not believe that the people at that time should be intrusted with the direct election of Senators. We are all well acquainted with the arguments and reasons given at that time for their action. In favoring this amendment to-day we are not questioning their judgment of that day. Experience and time are the best teachers, however, and from them and from long consideration by the American people I am thoroughly convinced that the best interests of this Government and of its people lies in the adoption of this amendment; thereby giving to the people the right to elect their Senators by direct vote and not by the State legislatures. The judgment of the people, when formed after long and serious intelligent consideration, is the best criterion for those to go by who have been intrusted with making the laws. The people want to elect by direct vote United States Senators—their minds are made up on that proposition. They have had some splendid lessons in the necessity of taking away from State legislatures this right. We all know that it is best that this amendment should pass. There is no division of this House as regards this amendment on partisan lines. Upon this side, as well as upon the other, we are all in favor of the principle involved in this resolution. The American people are in favor of it, and it is proper and right that they should be; so I will not dwell at length upon this proposition, because there is practically no contention regarding it.

To me there is one thing to be seriously considered, and that is the part of the resolution which provides for an amendment of section 4 of Article I, paragraph 1, of the Constitution, which is in the following language:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators.

It is proposed in this resolution to amend and strike out that portion of the Constitution which gives to Congress the right to regulate the election of Senators in the States, and to give this power over entirely to the State legislatures, so that it would read as follows:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.

I am opposed to that proposition; I am opposed to Congress giving up its powers of regulating and having a supervisory power over the election of United States Senators. Not that this power will probably be exercised, but the fact that it is known to exist would have a tendency to cause corrupt legislatures, such as has been known to exist in many States in recent years, to honestly and fairly provide for holding elections for United States Senators.

I therefore shall vote in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG], to retain to the Congress of the United States the power to regulate the manner and time of holding elections for Senators. If you gentlemen of the majority by your votes transfer this power from Congress to the State legislatures, you will be held to account by the American people. We are amending the Constitution so as to take away from State legislatures the power of choosing Senators because they have in many cases abused their power. Now, the resolution of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] proposes to give the legislatures additional power as to the time, manner, and place of electing Senators and to deprive the Congress of the United States of a rightful supervision over this matter, a supervision which Congress never has and never would abuse. You make a serious mistake, in my judgment, to vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG], thereby depriving Congress of the rights it is now given in this regard by the Constitution. However, I am for the resolution. I prefer it be amended as above indicated, but, whether amended or not, I intend voting for it and thus give to the people the right and power that they demand—rightfully demand—being proud indeed of the honor to cast my first vote in this House in favor of so important a matter, one that is so universally demanded and so universally needed. This Government will never suffer by listening to and granting the demands of the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NYE].

Mr. NYE. Mr. Speaker, there is but one question which seems to be an issue. I believe that history is a record of persistent human advance, and that the movement of the American people toward the exercise of more direct and more complete regulation of legislation and of the election of their officers is coming and will come to stay. I believe in this, I believe in the essential thing in this resolution, the election of United States Senators by the people. If the people make mistakes, let them make mistakes. The world is full of mistakes. We learn by making mistakes.

But we do touch upon a question which seems to me to be sacred, the one that eliminates from the Constitution the power given to Congress to legislate as to the manner and time of the election of Federal officers. Under that clause of the Constitution Congress has passed legislation. Back, I think, in 1872 such legislation was passed. I call attention of the House to some of the statements or language of the Supreme Court of the United States while passing upon this legislation.

It is impossible in the time that I have to give any thorough consideration to these cases. The first one that I have in mind is reported in 100 United States Reports, and is the case of Ex Parte Siebold, a habeas corpus case. The other is reported in 110 United States, and is the case of Ex Parte Yarbrough. These cases involve the laws which were passed regulating elections of Federal officers, Representatives, and Federal officials. I call attention to some of the language used by Mr. Justice Miller in the case which I last mentioned, and I can, of course, only read a small portion of the opinion:

> That a government whose essential character is republican, whose executive head and legislative body are both elective, whose most numerous and powerful branch of the legislature is elected by the people directly has no power by appropriate laws to secure this election from the influence of violence, of corruption, and of fraud is a proposition so startling as to arrest attention and demand the gravest consideration.

If this Government is anything more than a mere aggregation of delegated agents of other States and governments, each of which is superior to the General Government, it must have the power to protect the elections on which its existence depends from violence and corruption.

If it has not this power, it is left helpless before the two great natural and historical enemies of all republics—open violence and insidious corruption * * *

Will it be denied that it is in the power of that body [the Congress] to provide laws for the proper conduct of those elections? To provide, if necessary, the officers who shall conduct them and make return of the result? And especially to provide, in an election held under its own authority, for security of life and limb to the voter while in the exercise of this function? Can it be doubted that Congress can by law protect the act of voting, the place where it is done, and the man who votes, from personal violence or intimidation and the election itself from corruption and fraud?

If this be so, and it is not doubted, are such powers annulled because an election for State officers is held at the same time and place? Is it any less important that the election of Members of Congress should be the free choice of all the electors because State officers are to be elected at the same time?

These questions answer themselves; and it is only because the Congress of the United States, through long habit and long years of forbearance, has, in deference and respect to the States, refrained from the exercise of these powers that they are now doubted.

But when in pursuance of a new demand for action that body, as it did in the cases just enumerated, finds it necessary to make additional laws for the free, the pure, and the safe exercise of this right of voting, they stand upon the same ground and are to be upheld for the same reasons. * * *

If this were conceded, the importance to the General Government of having the actual election—the voting for those members—free from force and fraud is not diminished by the circumstance that the qualification of the voter is determined by the law of the State where he votes. It equally affects the Government, it is as indispensable to the proper discharge of the great function of legislating for that Government, that those who are to control this legislation shall not owe their election to bribery or violence, whether the class of persons who shall vote is determined by the law of the State or by law of the United States or by their united result. * * *

In conclusion the court says:

If the Government of the United States has within its constitutional domain no authority to provide against these evils, if the very sources of power may be poisoned by corruption or controlled by violence and outrage, without legal restraint, then, indeed, is the country in danger, and its best powers, its highest purposes, the hopes which it inspires, and the love which enshrines it, are at the mercy of the combinations of those who respect no right but brute force, on the one hand, and unprincipled corruptionists on the other.

Mr. Speaker, this case and the other that I referred to deals with legislation which was passed pursuant to this clause of the Constitution which we have debated here this afternoon and from both cases it would seem that the legislation rested wholly and purely upon that clause, a clause which seems to me to be sacred. I do not understand why gentlemen in the House want to take this out of the Constitution, at least upon so hasty consideration.

Can we afford to divest Congress of a constitutional power which in its very nature is essential to the preservation of the Nation? What emergencies may arise in the future we can not tell, nor in what State or section nor at what time. But the provision is a wise one and was designed to provide against any condition of lawlessness or corruption that might defeat or tend to defeat honest elections of Federal officers.

We do not distrust the people of any State, as intimated by gentlemen on the other side, but in matters of Federal supremacy our trust should be in all the people rather than a part. I regard the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan as essential, because it leaves, as the framers of the Constitution intended, this necessary power with the whole people. The amendment should be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, there are involved in this proposed amendment two propositions. The one providing for the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people is the first one. That, I think, practically every Member of the House is in favor of. I regret that anyone should undertake to gain, or to try to gain, any partisan advantage in the discussion of this particular proposition. I have no desire to discuss it in any partisan way whatever, but I want briefly to call the attention of my friends on the other side—those who undertook to make political capital out of it when they were boasting of the fact that the Republican Party had not seen fit to place this amendment in the Constitution when they were in power in both branches of the National Legislature—to the fact that when the Democratic Party was likewise in power in both branches of the Congress it likewise failed to put it in the Constitution or to submit the amendment.

As I have said, this resolution to amend the Constitution contains two separate and independent propositions. The first one, as I have mentioned, is the election of United States Senators by the direct vote of the people. The other one is to change section 4 of Article I of the Constitution by taking away from Congress the power and the right to legislate in regard to the election of United States Senators and give such control entirely and exclusively to the several States. These two changes in the Constitution are combined in this one resolution to amend. Unless the resolution can be amended, we must accept both of these amendments or reject them both. They have no connection with each other; they refer to separate parts of the Constitution, and I can see no logical reason why they should be combined in this way. The proposed amendment to take this power to legislate in regard to senatorial elections away from Congress and give it to the States has never received, so far as I know, the approval of any political party, and has never been favored by any considerable portion of our people. If we adopt the amendment to this resolution proposed by the gentleman from Michigan, the effect of such amendment will be to take out of the resolution that part which proposes to take this jurisdiction and power of legislation in regard to senatorial elections away from Congress. It will leave intact the proposition to elect Senators by a direct vote of the people. It is, in my judgment, to be very seriously regretted that the gentlemen who have charge of this resolution have seen fit to combine these two propositions into one. I am extremely anxious, and I believe the country is extremely anxious, to change the Constitution of the United States so as to provide for the election of United States Senators by a direct vote of the people themselves; but there are many citizens all over the country who, while they favor the election of Senators by direct vote, are conscientiously and unalterably opposed to the proposition of taking away from Congress the right to control congressional elections.

While, personally, I think it would be unwise to take this power away from Congress, yet I do not regard it myself as a serious proposition, and the greatest objection I have to incorporating these two propositions together is that there is great danger of defeating the main proposition by so doing. You will give to some of the special interests throughout the country who are opposed to electing Senators by a direct vote an opportunity to get behind this other objection and thus defeat what we are really trying to accomplish. Other men who seriously object to this other change but yet honestly think we ought to elect Senators by direct vote will be inclined to oppose the adoption of the amendment because you have coupled on to the proposition which they favor another proposition which they condemn, and it will therefore lose many votes and much of its force.

This resolution to become effective must be approved by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States. If we are in earnest, if we want to give the people of the country the right and the opportunity to change the Constitution and provide for the election of Senators by direct vote of the people, then let us in good faith amend this resolution so that it will provide only for the election of Senators by the direct vote of the people. There would be no doubt, in my judgment, of the approval of this amendment by a sufficient number of the legislatures if we would submit it in this simple form and not couple it up with something that many people honestly and conscientiously oppose. If you desire to submit an amendment on this additional change, then let it be a separate amendment. Let each one stand on its own merits and then the legislatures can choose both if they want to, but they will have the right to reject one and accept the other. The danger is that this amendment in its present form will fail because you have coupled on with a popular and desirable proposition one that is not demanded by the people and is condemned by a large number of people all through the country.

I want also to call his attention to the fact that at the present time, had the Democratic provision contained in the Democratic national platform been complied with by the Members of the United States Senate belonging to the Democratic Party, we would have the question now submitted to the legislatures of the several States.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I did not exactly understand, Mr. Speaker. Is the gentleman making some assault on some Democratic Senator?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I am not; I am simply answering a couple of gentlemen over on that side of the House who undertook to lay all the blame on the Republican Party because we had not before had the election of United States Senators by direct vote, and I want to say that, as a matter of fact, the men who are against the election of United States Senators by direct vote are in my party and they are in yours, and those who are in favor of it are likewise in both parties.

Under no circumstances do I want to impugn the motives of any man regardless of his politics on this question, and yet I heard the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] say in this debate that he was almost brought to the conclusion that there was something ulterior in the motives of men who wanted to amend this proposition, this resolution to change the Constitution, and I thought a complete answer to that would be that for the same reason it might be said that we should be ready to impugn your motives because you have two propositions to amend in this resolution. You have coupled with one that everybody favors another one about which there is a serious dispute as to whether it ought to be adopted or not. Everybody here is in favor, as far as I know, of the amendment providing for the election of Senators by direct vote of the people.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRIS. In a moment. Why, then, for God's sake, should you couple that proposition with another proposition that men are divided on and that is going to control the votes of many men on this proposition, not only here but before the legislatures of the different States, and which may defeat the whole thing? This amendment will have to be approved by three-fourths of the legislatures, and you have coupled two propositions together, one that is popular and everybody wants, as I take it, and——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NORRIS. Can I have a little more time?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I can yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NORRIS. And you have coupled it with another proposition which to me does not mean very much. I will favor the resolution whether the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan is adopted or not, but there are men all over the United States, conscientious and honest, who are going to oppose in the legislatures of the States the approval of this amendment unless you take out of it everything except the simple election of United States Senators by the people.

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman states that all on that side favor the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people.

Mr. NORRIS. If I said that, I will say all as far as I know. I do not know of any man who is against it on either side of this House.

Mr. JAMES. Is not it true that the gentleman's own political party has never yet had the courage in national convention to declare for it in any form?

Mr. NORRIS. That is true, but while your own political party had the courage to put that in your platform, yet when you had an opportunity in the United States Senate to redeem that pledge to the people you failed to do it.

Mr. JAMES. No; that is not true.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it is.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. That is a long time ago, before they commenced buying up legislatures.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I say it has been a long time since we had power in the United States Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. No; in the last Congress you had votes enough on the Democratic side to submit this proposition if they had all voted for it.

Mr. JAMES. Oh, no.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to say I have not looked the record up, but I think that is true. If the Democrats had voted solidly for this platform pledge, of which you boast, this proposition would have passed last Congress.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Why, certainly; of course.

Mr. NORRIS. I have favored the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people during all my public life. The evils of the present system are so great and so apparent that it seems to me this change ought to appeal to every reasonable thinking citizen. Within the observation of us all there has always been whenever the time comes for the election of United States Senators several State legislatures that have devoted their entire session to the consideration of this one subject alone, and very often without results. The State legislatures have duties to perform to their own States, and should be able to give their undivided attention to the discussion and the consideration of laws pertaining to their respective States. Wherever, however, a United States Senator is to be elected this question overshadows all other questions, and very often prevents the legislature from giving consideration to and passing the necessary bills of which the States sometimes are sorely in need. It is not an uncommon thing for an entire session of the legislature to be frittered away because of a deadlock on the question of the election of a United States Senator. Needed legislation is forgotten. The real duties pertaining to the membership are unperformed and not given proper consideration on account of the election of the United States Senator. The State laws are just as important to the people as national legislation, and often of more importance. Moreover, the present system is not fair to the individual voter. He often finds it impossible for him to express his choice at the ballot box as between a candidate for United States Senator and a candidate who represents his own ideas as to State laws and State regulation who is running for the State legislature.

The voter often is compelled to vote against a man for the State legislature who agrees with him absolutely and entirely as to his views regarding what laws should be enacted and put upon the statute books in his State, because only by so voting can he vote for a man who does agree with him as to who should represent the State in the United States Senate. The citizen must often surrender one conviction or the other and in such case, if he would work and vote for the candidate who would stand for his ideas of State government and State laws, he must surrender his conviction and not only give up his choice as to United States Senator, but he must vote for a man whom he knows will vote against his preference for United States Senator.

We have reached a stage in the development of political and social problems where great combinations of wealth have often too much influence in the framing of laws and in the selection of public officials. Too often it has been disclosed, in the history of the last 15 or 20 years, that money has taken too important a part in the control of the legislature when it comes to the election of a United States Senator, until it had almost become common knowledge among our people that no poor man need apply. In other cases men have been elected to the Senate through the legislature by trading patronage for legislative votes. Members of the legislature who give their votes for the successful candidate have been rewarded by having dealt out to them some fat political job, or if not to them directly, to some of their closest friends. It is a question in my mind whether an election controlled by patronage is not a greater evil than one which is controlled directly by money. Both are wrong; both ought to be eradicated, and both ought to be made impossible. The purchasing of an office directly by money in some respects at least is not as bad and not as much evil follows from it as though the bargain and sale were made for a consideration of official place and patronage. When the deal is made with money, the contract is ended when the votes are delivered and the person elected, but when the office is purchased by the giving of patronage or position, then the Government very likely secures the appointment of incompetent, if not dishonest, men and so the taxpayers must pay in the end for the unholy alliance.

I do not charge that these things have occurred often or frequently, but there are none of us who can not call to mind in recent years or in recent days many illustrations of this kind. During the present winter several legislatures frittered away the entire legislative session in senatorial deadlock. In some instances there has been no charge, either direct or indirect, of any dishonesty or anything wrong. Men simply disagreed as to who should be their Senator. In other cases the newspapers have been filled with charges of all kinds, where it has been openly charged that money has been offered and refused, and in other cases where positions of honor, profit, and trust in official place have been offered in return for political votes, and in one of the great States of the Union the disclosures have been so remarkable and have shown such a disgraceful and dishonorable condition of barter and sale that it must bring the blush of shame to the countenance of every honest, patriotic citizen.

If Senators were elected by a direct vote of the people, these things could not occur. In a government founded upon the consent of the governed the largest possible participation in governmental affairs on the part of the people themselves is to be desired. It has been argued in the past by those who have opposed this amendment that the people themselves are not as well qualified to elect a Senator as are the members of the State legislatures. I am confident that the past history of our senatorial elections has demonstrated that this is an error. I do not expect the change to bring about perfection; that can not come to any government composed of mortal men. Mistakes will be made by the people, but if it is the people's government and they desire to select their officials and make mistakes, they themselves will be responsible. They will undoubtedly profit by whatever mistakes they may make. In addition to this, this new responsibility placed upon the shoulders of the citizens will have a tendency to increase the intelligence and the interest that people generally will take in these elections. When you place a new responsibility upon an intelligent and honest man, he does the best he can to prepare himself for the proper performance of his new duty, to intelligently inform himself as to the best way he can perform his additional responsibility. There is no doubt but what the citizenship of our country generally are dissatisfied with the present method of selecting United States Senators. They have seen too many cases where the will of the people has been absolutely nullified and where special interests and wealthy combinations have succeeded in absolutely naming the United States Senator.

The Senate of the United States is one of the highest and most honorable tribunals in the civilized world. I have great respect for its membership. It has to-day upon its roll some of our greatest statesmen, our ablest men, our most patriotic citizens. The history of our country shows that liberty and freedom have had many able defenders in this forum. This change of electing them by the people will not detract from the ability of the Senate. It will relieve it, however, of all suspicion of being too far removed from the people themselves and of all charge of its Members being too often elected by the illegal use of money and political patronage. It will prevent the election to the United States Senate of some Members who have not honored it in the past and who could under no circumstances be elected to the Senate if the entire citizenship had a voice in the settlement of the question.

This change is demanded by almost a unanimous sentiment of well-meaning and patriotic people. Our forefathers, in framing the Constitution, were not confronted with many of the great questions that confront us to-day. They were not called upon then to make any laws in regard to great railroads and transportation companies, because in those days there were no railroads. Neither were they called upon to consider the question of great combinations of capital and wealth, because in that day there was nothing similar to the great combinations that have grown up under modern conditions. A great many other dissimilarities between the conditions then and now might be mentioned. It is but reasonable for us to recognize what is recognized by all the people—that these great corporations and combinations have too much of a voice in modern legislation. Their activities in politics and in legislation have created prejudice against them that, in some instances perhaps, goes too far. But there can be no doubt but what their activities in legislation in many cases have resulted in laws that gave them an unfair advantage over the ordinary person.

This is a step toward placing the real government in the hands of the people themselves. It is upon the citizens that we depend for stability as a government. It is upon the patriotic, common, industrious people of our country that our Government must always lean in time of danger and distress. To this class of people, then, we should give the right to control by direct election the selection of our public officials and to permit each citizen who is a part of the sinew and backbone of our Government in time of danger to exercise his influence by direct vote in time of peace.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Will the gentleman from Missouri use a little of his time now?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield five minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY].

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Speaker, I wish I could say to-day that I represented the Legislature of Rhode Island, but I feel confident in saying that I represent the people of Rhode Island in giving my advocacy and vote to the proposed amendment directing the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people. It may seem strange for me to say that I do not represent the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island, but to you it will be made very plain when I state that the legislature of that State does not represent the people of the State. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Rhode Island unfortunately is one of those distinct cases to which we can point unerringly as a victim of archaic laws and a moribund constitution. And I am gratified that the Democracy is in power in this House, in order that we may take a short cut across lots in Rhode Island and give to the people the power to vote for United States Senators, and in that way help them materially to an enjoyment of liberties which have been suppressed by moth-eaten charters. [Applause on the Democratic side.] To-day in the State of Rhode Island they are battling for an enlarged franchise, which is to my mind a convertible term for an enlarged freedom. I can better illustrate it by telling you that the city of Providence, with a population of 225,000 people and a qualified electorate of 29,030, is represented in the State senate of Rhode Island by one member, and that another section of the population, containing 40,398 people and 5,620 qualified voters, is represented in the same senate by 20 senators. You can easily see the disproportion; and you can easily recognize how derelict I would be in my duty if I did not say something for poor, downtrodden Rhode Island to-day. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And it is that condition, and it is that frightful misrepresentation, a minority of the people, a fraction, practically, of the people, represented in the legislature through a rotten borough system, that sent for so many years to the United States the gentleman who gave the Democratic Party its great opportunity when he wrote into the laws the odius and malodorous Payne-Aldrich tariff law. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We can take virtue from that condition, and we can exercise a little joy in the thought that the gentleman misrepresenting the State of Rhode Island in the United States Senate did not represent the people of the State of Rhode Island, but did represent only a poor fraction or minority of them.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I will.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. The gentleman has spoken of the inequality of representation in the Rhode Island Legislature. Would the gentleman favor an amendment to the Constitution of the United States which would only give Rhode Island a representation in the Senate of the United States to which it is entitled by its population? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I would not; and I will say to the gentleman from Michigan that that is a sort of threadbare argument down my way and they have been harping on it for a century. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am very much, profoundly, in fact, in favor of this amendment to the Constitution of the United States. I believe that it will do away with the contest of moneybags. I believe it will restore the representation of the people to where it belongs.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I want but one minute more.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. In the opportunity given to me to-day I wish to emphasize my thorough accord with an enlarged franchise. I wish to emphasize my thorough accord with the principle that the people should rule; and if there is any place in this whole country where that opportunity is awaited more impatiently than in another it is in the little State of Rhode Island. I can say, possibly with some sorrow for my brethren on the Republican side of the House, that once we get this amendment to the Constitution and once we have the popular election of Senators in the State of Rhode Island I believe firmly, just as sure as I am standing here, that we shall have two Democratic Senators representing that State. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, the most interesting feature of this debate is the evidence which it affords of the growth of a democratic idea whose evolution has been continuously and pertinaciously opposed, by the reactionary thought of this country.

I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to undertake to discuss at this time the conditions, and underlying reasons which have brought about the great change in the popular attitude toward the election of Senators by the people. It is well understood that the country favors this principle. Hence the unanimity with which the gentlemen on the minority side have come forward to commit themselves to its support. But after declaring themselves in favor of the principle, they find a stumbling block in the way of supporting the pending bill, in the fact that the proposed amendment does not contain the present provision of the Constitution relating to the time, the place, and the manner of holding elections. They seem to apprehend danger in that portion of the joint resolution which gives to the respective States the right to control the time, place, and manner of holding the elections contemplated by the amendment.

I wish to discuss briefly this ground of objection, and to show why in my judgment the power to control the time, place, and manner of holding these elections should be given to the States. Some gentlemen say that when you take away this power from the Congress, you will impair the symmetry of the Constitution. Whenever you engraft upon the Constitution the principle of electing Senators by the people, you will thereby so impair the symmetry of the instrument as it came from the craftsmen who provided with such care against the popular selection of these officials that the additional impairment involved in extending to the States the right to control their election may well be overlooked. But why do I contend that this feature of the Constitution relative to the control of Congress over the time and manner of holding elections should be eliminated from that instrument? For this very sufficient reason, Mr. Speaker, that no one has ever been able to ascertain the extent of the power conferred by the present language upon the Congress of the United States.

It has been suggested that this language was inserted to enable the Congress of the United States—that is the Federal Government—to preserve itself in time of emergency. But, Mr. Speaker, I desire to say, that in time of stress, when the existence of a nation is at stake, the people of that nation do those things that are necessary and vital to protect themselves, and to preserve their integrity as a nation, without regard to the limitations of a written constitution.

Mr. KOPP. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. SAUNDERS. I do.

Mr. KOPP. Does the gentleman know of any reason why the Senate should release the supervisory control of elections and the House of Representatives should retain it?

Mr. SAUNDERS. None whatever.

Mr. KOPP. Then why is this not made at least symmetrical in that respect, and why not strike out the whole provision?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Simply because it would not be appropriate in this connection. We are now dealing with the popular election of Senators only, but there is no reason why in the proper manner and at the proper time the same power of control should not be extended to the States in respect of the election of Members of the House of Representatives.

But, Mr. Speaker, if there is no occasion to retain the present language of the Constitution, on the ground that it is necessary for the vital existence of the Republic, then we ought not to retain in our organic law any language which is not susceptible of definite ascertainment and positive meaning.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Yes; I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. If we do not know what the language means, and the purpose is to correct the Constitution in that respect, why not at the same time strike out the same provision in reference to the election of Members of this House?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Inasmuch as this amendment relates to the election of Senators, the language used is pertinent and germane, but it would be inappropriate in this connection to undertake to strike out the provision of the Constitution relating to the control of Congress over the election of Members of the House. Personally I have no objection to such action being taken, and would be glad to see it done at the proper time. I hope this answers the gentleman's question.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, I will ask two minutes more of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. So many gentlemen are asking for time, Mr. Speaker, that I will have to limit the gentleman to one minute.

Mr. SAUNDERS. So many questions have been asked me, that the answers have consumed a large portion of my time.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will give the gentleman from Virginia two minutes.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Now, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I wish to say that that which is unknown is always terrifying, and to retain in a written instrument language which does not convey a precise and definite authority is to retain that which will be a lurking element of danger. In the history of our Government, in all our times of stress, the time has never yet arrived when the statesmen of the country have been able to ascertain what this language means, or to enact any legislation under its authority. Looking down the vista of time, I can not see that the retention of this provision in the organic law in relation to the election of Senators is in any wise necessary for the preservation of our liberties, or rights, or for the promotion of the national safety.

For what purpose, may I ask those gentlemen who insist upon its retention—for what purpose should this vague and indefinite power of control over State elections, be retained in the hands of Congress? There is no question of partisan politics involved. If the Constitution, is changed in this respect, the change will enlarge the power of all the States alike. It will not afford an exclusive, or dangerous power to any section of the United States.

There is no portion of our common country that is interested in the retention of this indefinite power by Congress. This fact I call to the attention of the gentlemen who profess to favor the general principle of popular election of Senators but oppose the present bill, merely because one of its provisions gives to the States a power which they should have had from the beginning. They are ready to imperil the principle which they profess to be willing to support, on a ground which is palpably flimsy and unsubstantial. No gentleman in this debate has undertaken to define, or to declare the extent of the power which it is supposed that Congress now enjoys over the time and manner of holding elections to elect the Members of this House. The Congress of the United States to-day enjoys no control over the place of holding the elections. It possesses a power, over the time and manner only, which no expositor of the Constitution has ever been able to fix in any precise terms. This bill should pass in the form in which it was reported. The people have demanded this reform, and the enactment of this law in terms that can not be misunderstood, and the response to that demand should be its passage by a unanimous vote of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I think gentlemen on that side of the aisle are alarming themselves unduly over the effect of the modification of the paragraph of the Constitution to which so much reference has been made. I frankly state that I should not vote against this proposition if the proposed modification was not contained in the resolution; but I do prefer that it should be contained therein. And what, in common reason, may I ask, Mr. Speaker, can be the objection to retaining it? What is this resolution itself? It is but the expression of a confidence in the judgment, the wisdom, and the patriotism of the people of the States. If the people can be trusted to elect their Senators, may they not be trusted to regulate the manner and the time of choosing the Senators?

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], in addressing the Chamber this morning, referred to what he himself declared to be an extreme case, that of a State seceding, and asked how the Federal Government could preserve and perpetuate its organization under such a condition as that. Mr. Speaker, there was a time when many States seceded. The Federal Government at that time possessed this power. Did it preserve its power and its prestige by regulating the election of Senators in the States under the power that it then possessed? Oh, no; it preserved its power and its prestige by force and arms, just as it will have to do again should such a condition arise. The leaving of that power in the Congress of the United States will not aid in preserving the power of the Government under such conditions as that. It is consistent with the thought that underlies this amendment, in that it is adding to the power of the people of the States; and, as I have said, being not only willing but anxious to give to the people of the States the power which they demand, of acting directly upon those who shall represent the States in the coordinate legislative branch of the Government, I am willing to go still further and say that if they are capable of doing that they certainly are capable of dealing patriotically and wisely with the question of the manner and the time of choosing those officers. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Michigan if he will consume the balance of his time? As far as I know, there will be only one more speaker on this side.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Will the Chair state how much time we have left on each side?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan has 47 minutes and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] has 42 minutes remaining.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. UTTER].

Mr. UTTER. Mr. Speaker, I hardly expected that the necessity would arise to-day to defend Rhode Island, and I am glad to say that Rhode Island does not need any defense. When the opportunity arises for this House to consider Rhode Island under the state of the Union, Rhode Island will be found making a favorable report. [Applause.] I do think it is proper for me to say, however, that though I have been a resident of the State of Rhode Island for half a century, and my colleague from that State [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY] has been a resident of the State for a little less than four years, I doubt if he is any more ready to leave the State to-day than I am. Indeed, both of us intend to stay. [Applause.]

The resolution which we have before us to-day provides for two things. This Congress has put upon it two duties. The first is the duty of providing a way by which the people can express their opinions in amending their Constitution; the second is the duty of doing that in such a form that the people can pass upon that amendment in a clear and understanding manner.

This resolution proposes two things: The first is open and frank; it proposes to give to the people of the various States the right to elect their Senators by direct vote. It proposes, in the second place, a thing that is not open, a thing that is not frank, and that is to change the Constitution in such a way as to rob Congress of the right to protect itself. [Applause.]

I have heard nothing here on either side of criticism of the first open and frank proposition. Members on both sides, almost unanimously, have stated that they believed in the election of United States Senators by the people. The only criticism that has come has been criticism of submitting to the people so important a change in such a manner that they can not pass upon one change without also passing upon another.

Mr. Speaker, I have been listening as a new Member, and I have been pleased by the remarks made by members of the majority that they wanted to play fair. If you want to play fair as a body, play fair by placing before the people the resolution of amendment in such a form that they can understand it and vote on the prime purpose, and not be held back by a secondary amendment. I therefore ask you to accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG], and having accepted the amendment to ratify the resolution and ratify it practically unanimously. As the gentleman from Illinois has well said, while the people of the United States have plainly asked for the privilege of electing Senators by the votes of the people of the several States, they have not and will not demand that the Senate and the House of Representatives yield their power to protect themselves. Therefore, in order to protect ourselves as we legislate for the great American people, we should adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan, and then unanimously pass the constitutional amendment asked for by the people. [Applause.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask if the gentleman from Michigan understands that there is but one more speech to be made on this side?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I expected to yield to a gentleman whom I supposed had changed his mind. I now understand differently, and I will yield to him now.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Very well.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I can not hope to add anything to this discussion. I am in favor of the resolution as it comes from the committee. It is the same resolution that has been passed by this House and which for three times the House has almost unanimously voted, both Republican and Democratic, when the House was overwhelmingly Republican. It is the same resolution that the Judiciary Committee of the Senate reported, word for word, unanimously at the last session. It is the same resolution—in fact, it contains the same language—that would have passed the Senate and been now the law upon the statute book—submitting to the people of the United States the great change in our Constitution which the people have demanded, which the Democratic Party in its platform and pledges have for years demanded—had not the enemies of the resolution in the United States Senate injected into the resolution an amendment which is now offered on the floor of this House to accomplish the same purpose, the defeat of this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, if we can submit to the people of the States of this Union this resolution, amended as is proposed, we take away from them the right to prescribe the qualifications of voters in the election of Senators and destroy the form of government that was intended by the fathers—a union of States, and not a consolidated confederate empire, simply an empire with provinces. Those of us who believe in local self-government ought not to be asked to give into the hands of Congress expressly the power to invade the States and regulate the franchises of their citizens and the manner of holding their elections.

While I heartily approve of the election of United States Senators by the people, I can not support the proposition that Congress shall have the power to regulate and supervise these elections in the States; and if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan shall be adopted I can not support the resolution.

I have stated that the amendment offered here is the same as that proposed in the Senate. I find it is the exact amendment which, being adopted in the Senate, accomplished the defeat of the resolution in the Senate at the last session, which was as follows:

Senate joint resolution 134.

Amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. SUTHERLAND to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 134) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States, viz:

On page 1, line 7, after the word "vacancy," strike out the words "and in lieu of all of paragraph 1 of section 4 of said Article I, in so far as the same relates to any authority in Congress to make or alter regulations as to the times or manner of holding elections for Senator."

And on page 2 strike out, in lines 9, 10, and 11, the words "The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof."

I recall that there have been times, Mr. Speaker, when the Congress of the United States has endeavored, with reference to the election of Representatives in Congress and other matters that affected certain sections of this country, to pass stringent, violent, and forceful laws. In many cases it took the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States to decide that those laws were unconstitutional, and the question as to whether Congress can invade the States and regulate the election even of Representatives is one of some doubt, because the cases decided by the Supreme Court were not decided by a unanimous court, but by a bare majority of the court. In a case to which I desire to allude, and which I hold in my hand, the Supreme Court decided that the State of Michigan had a right to prescribe the manner of holding the election for electors for President. The State of Michigan prescribed for this election of electors for President by congressional districts.

That was the case of McPherson v. Blocker (146 U. S. Repts., p. 1), in which the court decided:

Under the Constitution the legislatures of the several States have exclusive power to direct the manner in which the electors of President and Vice President shall be appointed.

Such appointment may be made by the legislatures directly or by popular vote in districts or by general ticket, as may be provided by the legislatures.

In the same case, and in many others, cited in this case, the court decides that the right to vote in the States comes from the States; and that the right to vote intended to be protected by the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments refers to the right to vote as established by the laws and constitutions of the States.

Surely, if we can leave to the States the right to determine who shall vote for the Chief Executive, we can and should not depart from that safe and sound constitutional rule in the election of Senators. The great end in view sought to be obtained by this resolution, and which has been so constantly demanded by the people, is not that the Congress shall regulate the election of Senators by invading the rights of the States and local self-government, but that the qualified voters of the States, qualified as such by the laws and requirements prescribed by the State legislatures, shall have the right to choose directly United States Senators, and that power shall be no longer lodged in the legislatures of the States.

Quoting from Mr. Jefferson:

The Senate was intended as a check on the will of the Representatives when too hasty; they are not only that, but completely so on the will of the people also; and in my opinion are heaping coals of fire not only on their persons, but on their body as a branch of the legislature. It seems that the opinion is fairly launched into public that they should be placed under the control of a more frequent recurrence to the will of their constituents. This seems requisite to complete the experiment, whether they do more harm or good. Mischief may be done negatively as well as positively. Of this the Senate has furnished many proofs.

I do not know whether this was true at the time when Mr. Jefferson wrote these words, but we do know that in more recent years the action of the Senate on many important questions has been such that the demand has constantly grown that the manner of electing United States Senators shall be changed. And I trust that the day is not far distant when this demand of the people shall be complied with. The passage of this resolution by Congress will bring to the people a realization of their hopes, so long deferred. [Applause.]

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR].

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, it was my purpose to offer an amendment to line 4, page 2, to insert after the word "the" the following words, "direct vote of the"; but I yield my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who contemplates offering some amendments, one of which will cover the point I have in view. I shall take this opportunity, however, to say that the people of the district I have the honor to represent—Scranton, Pa., and Lackawanna County—are very generally in favor of United States Senators being elected by the direct votes of the people, and, in accordance with their wishes and my own convictions, I shall cheerfully vote in favor of an amendment to the Constitution to give the people that privilege.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, it has seemed to me from the discussion this afternoon that there is here more or less misapprehension as to the law; and, with due deference to the distinguished gentlemen who entertain views different from my own, I desire to state the law as I understand it. The right to vote is not a Federal right. It does not come from the Constitution of the United States. Under the Constitution each State has always had the sole power to prescribe the qualifications of its electors. The pending amendment leaves this power unchanged, and under it the States would still have the right to say what shall be the qualifications of those who are to vote for United States Senators. Those qualifications this amendment prescribes shall be the qualifications of electors for the lower branch of the respective State legislatures.

All that the Federal Constitution does by the fifteenth amendment, to which reference has been frequently made, is to guarantee that a certain kind of discrimination therein specified shall not be practiced by the States. The right of suffrage itself, the qualifications of electors, comes from the State statute. Here is the fifteenth amendment:

> The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.
> The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Now, if the proposed amendment shall become a part of the Constitution, then when a State has fixed the qualifications of the citizens who can vote for members of the lower branch of the State legislature, those citizens will be the persons who can vote for United States Senators. If any State should pass a law declaring that white citizens could vote for United States Senators, but that colored citizens could not, the Supreme Court, of course, would pronounce such a law unconstitutional.

While I would prefer that this amendment, in order that it might have been insured passage by the requisite number of States, should not contain the provision it does contain nullifying part of paragraph 4 of section 1, nevertheless I am unable to see such possible harm to come as has been talked about so frequently and so forcefully here to-day. There is now a Federal statute which would punish any conspiracy of election commissioners or other persons in a State who should undertake, in violation of the fifteenth amendment, to deprive qualified electors of the State of their right to vote.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I have not time to amplify this.

There is another phase of the question about which I wish to say a word. I hope gentlemen appreciate my pleasure on hearing distinguished Republicans rise on this floor to-day and in exultant tones proclaim that there is unanimity among Republicans everywhere as to the wisdom of having United States Senators elected by the people. But, Mr. Speaker, it was not always so. I had the honor on behalf of the State of Wisconsin in the Republican national convention of 1908 to present a plank calling for the election of United States Senators by the people. It received 114 votes out of a total of more than 900. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I remember that a distinguished Republican, the chairman of the committee on resolutions, Mr. Hopkins, then United States Senator from the State of Illinois, denounced that plank and rejoiced when Republicans repudiated it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I cite this at this time only to remind the House that, in the language of the Rev. John Jasper, of Richmond, Va., "The world do move." [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Does the gentleman desire more time?

Mr. COOPER. I would like a minute more.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. In order to have this matter fully, fairly, and freely discussed, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for 10 minutes additional.

Mr. COOPER. I am under very great obligations to the gentleman from Missouri. I appreciate the disinterestedness of his motives. [Laughter and applause.] Not for the world would he see any trouble on this side of the Chamber! [Laughter and applause.] But I shall not say another word about the Chicago convention. [Laughter.] Nor shall I proceed any further to elaborate upon the law——

Mr. HAYES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COOPER. I do.

Mr. HAYES. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think that the resolution as proposed by the majority, if it should be submitted to the people of the several States and receive their approval, would not nullify a portion of the fifteenth amendment to which the gentleman has referred?

Mr. COOPER. I do not at all think so.

Mr. HAYES. The last expression of the popular will, the gentleman thinks, would not control?

Mr. COOPER. It would not nullify any part of the fifteenth amendment.

Mr. HAYES. I think it would.

Mr. COOPER. Just a moment. My contention is this: That the right guaranteed to every voter in the United States by the Constitution of the United States is that the State of which he is a citizen shall not discriminate against him as a voter on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. There is nothing in the Federal Constitution to prevent a State from fixing a property qualification for the suffrage and saying that no man not possessed of $50,000 worth of property should have the right to vote. No State ought to pass a law of that kind; but any State might pass such a law unless its own State constitution would prevent. The Federal Constitution would permit the State of the distinguished gentleman from California to enact a statute providing that only citizens worth $50,000 might vote, but thereupon the fifteenth amendment would guarantee every citizen of that State worth $50,000 the right to vote whether he were white or colored.

The qualifications of electors are fixed by the State statutes, and the Constitution guarantees, let me repeat, that there shall be no discrimination between citizen voters because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. This right being guaranteed by the Constitution, the United States, as a sovereign Nation, has the power to pass a law which shall protect that right and punish those who violate it. Congress has already enacted such a law—section 5508 of the Revised Statutes:

> If two or more persons conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise and enjoyment of any right or privilege granted to him by the Constitution or the laws of the United States, etc., * * * he shall be punished, etc.

That is broad enough to cover violations of the provisions of the fourteenth or fifteenth amendments. It could be made specifically to cover cases coming under the fifteenth amendment. And it could be amended——

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. COOPER. In just a moment. Now, there is in this connection another subject to which we as Republicans ought to direct our attention. As a Republican born and bred, reared in a Republican atmosphere, coming from among a people who conducted stations of the underground railroad to help men and women to liberty, I greatly deplore the fact that in certain portions of the Republic citizens are disfranchised by statute practically, and only because of their color. Every disfranchisement, as I understand it, is under a statute.

Mr. BARTLETT. Under the constitution of the State.

Mr. COOPER. Under the constitution of the State, and those statutes have been taken—the "grandfather" statute and others—to the Supreme Court of the United States and declared to be constitutional.

Mr. HAYES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. There are a good many phases of this question. But I do not believe——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES]?

Mr. COOPER. In just a moment. As I said, this resolution would have been more certain of receiving the support of the requisite number of States if it had been drawn somewhat differently, but if it should pass in this form I do not believe that the rights of any citizen would be jeopardized. And the men who believe in the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people ought not to jeopardize the necessary two-thirds vote by voting against the resolution in its original form if it becomes necessary to vote upon that naked proposition. There are good men here who believe the resolution as presented is dangerous; but there are bad men, cunning men throughout the country who want this resolution defeated at all hazards. [Applause.] No mere technicality conjured up here should suffice to defeat a thing so vital to the welfare of the Republic.

One of the gentlemen said that when our forefathers enacted the Constitution conditions were not as they are to-day. That is true. There is to-day such a concentration of wealth and power—often of dangerously corrupting influences—around State legislatures as our forefathers never dreamed of, as the world never imagined until within the last 40 years. Therefore this amendment ought to pass, and will pass, in some form or other, I sincerely hope. I shall vote for the amendment proposed, and if that does not pass then I shall vote for the original resolution.

Now, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. HAYES. I wish to ask the gentleman if he has not failed to discriminate between the amendment to the Constitution which controls the Congress of the United States and the statute passed by Congress which a majority of both Houses may repeal at any time?

Mr. COOPER. Not at all. And the gentleman fails to see the point which I attempted to make, which is, that this amendment leaves with the States the right to fix the qualifications of the electors.

Mr. HAYES. Surely; but it takes away from the Congress of the United States the right to supervise the election of Senators and to regulate the manner in which they shall be elected, which it has at present under the Constitution.

Mr. COOPER. We have not the right to-day to fix the qualifications of electors. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. We have never had that right under the Constitution.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Congress never had the right to fix the qualifications of the electors of the States. [Applause.]

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I now yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendments, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 2, line 4, by inserting after the word "by" the following: "A direct vote of."

Amend page 2, lines 7 and 8, by striking out the word "legislatures" and inserting the word "legislature."

Amend page 2, line 15, by striking out the words "that the legislature of any State may empower," and on line 16, by striking out the word "to" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "shall."

Amend on page 2, line 18, by striking out the words "so" and "as."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this House has on a number of occasions in the past passed a joint resolution providing for a direct vote on the election of Senators. So far as I remember, I have never voted for that resolution. I shall not vote for this resolution.

I am not prepared to say whether, in my own judgment, Senators should be elected by a direct vote or by the method now provided by the Constitution. But I think I am able to see far enough into the future to see that if it shall be provided that Senators shall be elected by a direct vote of the people of the various States it is but the beginning of the end of State sovereignty, of the sovereign rights of a State, or the powers of a State, as they now exist, over local matters.

The gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY] a moment ago complained of the constitution and laws of his State, which give to one district with a small population the same representation in the senate of that State that the city of Providence has, with a population of more than 200,000. So long as we have maintained the principle that the Senators were delegates of the State, elected by the legislatures of the State, we could well claim that each State should have the same representation.

But the very reason that causes the gentleman from Rhode Island to refer with invective to the laws of his State which take away equal representation will, in the course of a few years, when the Senators are elected by the States by direct vote of the people, cause the great State of New York, the great State of Illinois, aye, the people of the great country in which we live, to say, "There is no reason why a man in Rhode Island voting for a United States Senator should be the equal of 20 men in the State of New York."

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will not yield at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman refuses to yield.

Mr. MANN. It is the logic of events, Mr. Speaker, which controls us in the long run. And there is nothing so inexorable as the logic of events. We think now that if we change the method of electing Senators and provide that they shall be elected by a direct vote of the people we do not change the theory of the Constitution. Aye, but we do, and when but a short time goes on—it may be shorter or longer—the people will say that it is unfair to have rotten boroughs in States, as the gentleman from Rhode Island would say they have rotten boroughs in Rhode Island. For many years in England members of Parliament were elected from rotten boroughs, without population to speak of, but having the same power and the same influence that those members had who came from great centers of population, representing great numbers of people.

Now, so far as I am concerned, I am yet undecided in my own mind as to how far the present tendency of events ought to proceed in the abolition of the powers and the rights of the States.

Under the commerce clause of the Constitution we have already largely deprived the States of their powers, and as in business we meet the commercial affairs of the country we are constantly importuned on every side to add to the powers of the General Government and to take away the powers of the local governments. I do not undertake to say which is the proper course, but so long as I have been in this legislative body I have endeavored to maintain the rights of the States as originally contemplated, believing that if the time came when State lines should be practically abolished, it ought to be done with knowledge and by the direct representation and mandate of the people, instead of being done indirectly.

Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest benefits which the citizens of our country enjoy is the right of local self-government. I do not wish to be a party in any degree to the taking away from the people of the right of local self-government.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to discuss the merits of this proposition to any extent, forced upon us in the way that it has been, without a fair chance to consider it.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me at present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman refuses to yield.

Mr. MANN. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman later. When I say that this proposition has been forced upon us in the way that it has been, without a fair chance to consider it, I do not mean merely the opportunity to talk about it on the floor of the House. I mean the opportunity to offer amendments, the chance to really consider the proposition. In the last Congress the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], the colleague of the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], introduced a resolution on this subject. There had been many resolutions passed before it. In the Fifty-fourth Congress, in the Fifty-fifth Congress, in the Fifty-sixth Congress, in the Fifty-seventh Congress a resolution had been passed providing for the direct election of Senators. A resolution similar to those four which had previously passed was introduced in the last Congress by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] and reported favorably from the committee, though never passed through the House. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] introduced on April 4, the first day of this session, a resolution quite similar to the one which had been four times passed and which, one other time, had been introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] and reported into the House; but the resolution as it comes before us for action, without a chance to give it consideration, is an entirely different one.

I propose to call attention to some of the particular things in the resolution now pending. Gentlemen may say that the criticism I make is a carping criticism. Mr. Speaker, it has always seemed to me that the Constitution of the United States was sufficiently important to consider both the merits and the form of the amendments which might be adopted to it. It has always seemed to me that Congress might even consider rhetoric and grammar when adding an amendment to the Constitution.

When we remember that there have been so few amendments added in all the many years of the existence of our Constitution, it has seemed to me that we might take sufficient time at least to put an amendment in proper grammatical and rhetorical shape. Considering the fact that there have been only three amendments added to the Constitution in more than 100 years, I think we might take sufficient time to say what we mean in proper grammatical form, so that one who runs may read and understand.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Will the gentleman permit me to say——

Mr. MANN. I will permit the gentleman to say anything in the way of a question. Otherwise I hope he will wait until I get further along.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will not ask the gentleman a question if he does not want me to, but will reserve it until later.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes.

Mr. COOPER. Did I understand the gentleman from Illinois to say that if we were to elect Senators by the people there would be great danger of the large States overriding the smaller States?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I suppose the gentleman proposes to read me a constitutional provision that that can not be done.

Mr. COOPER. I wish simply to remind——

Mr. MANN. I am familiar with the Constitution on the subject.

Mr. COOPER. It seems to me that there is a sufficient answer to the gentleman. I ask him if he does not think this answers it?—

No State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

Mr. MANN. Yes; and that provision of the Constitution is subject to amendment; and when the tendency runs, as it will run, so strong against the gross injustice of permitting——

Mr. COOPER. That particular provision is not subject to amendment, and it is the only one in the Constitution that is not. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken; that provision of the Constitution is subject to amendment. Every provision of the Constitution is subject to amendment. That provision itself must first be amended before you can deprive a State of its equal rights in the Senate; but when that provision has been amended, as it will be some day, then they will make the division among the States equitable, because in the end it is absolutely unfair that the State of Delaware should have 2 Senators in the United States Senate and 1 Representative on the floor of the House and the great State of New York should have, as it is now proposed, 40 Members of the House and only 2 Senators.

What is there in that to carry out the will of the people? Gentlemen talk about obeying the will of the people. If the will of the people is to be executed, then the people must have the chance to elect their Representatives upon equal terms, and the logic is as inevitable as that the sun will rise to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. McCALL. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. MANN. I will yield.

Mr. McCALL. In reference to what the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] has said, if the States refuse to yield their representation, would it be possible to amend the Constitution, taking all the power away from the Senate?

Mr. MANN. You can amend the Constitution in any way. Now, Mr. Speaker, one of the amusing things, it seems to me, in reference to this amendment is, in the first place, the whole theory of the proposed amendment is that the legislatures of the States can not be trusted. That is the whole theory of the amendment—that the legislatures of the different States can not be trusted. The Constitution provides that an amendment may be ratified by the legislatures or by conventions called in the States. And yet the distinguished gentleman from Missouri seeks to cast odium, as it would be by the amendment, on the legislatures, rejecting the right of a State to determine whether it shall ratify this amendment by convention, but requires that it shall be left wholly to the legislature. If he has such a wonderful belief in the rights of the people as expressed by direct vote, why has it not been left in a way that the State may elect conventions to pass upon this resolution?

It provides further, in reference to legislatures, that the legislature may or it may not empower the executive to fill vacancies temporarily. No requirement has been carried in all resolutions heretofore that the executive shall make an appointment to fill vacancies. It proposes to leave to the legislature that authority. In addition to that, stating on the one hand that the legislature is unworthy of trust to elect United States Senators, it proposes to say that the legislature is so worthy that it shall determine as to the time and places and manner of holding elections, and placing the legislature above Congress. On the one side this resolution says that the legislature is unworthy of confidence, and on the other that it is worthy of more confidence than Congress itself. That is logic for you. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen all the afternoon have been talking about election of Senators by direct vote of the people. The resolutions which have heretofore passed this body, the resolution which was introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] in the last Congress, provided—

> That the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, who shall be elected by the direct vote of the people thereof for a term of six years.

"Elected by the direct vote of the people thereof." Anybody can understand what that means. Anybody knows what that says, and it says that they shall be elected by a direct vote of the people. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] this morning announced that there would be no amendments to this resolution of his—no dotting of "i's" or crossing of "t's"; he had perfected it and did not propose to have it amended.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I want to say to the gentleman that the gentleman from Missouri said nothing of the kind, but said just the contrary, and stated that opportunity would be permitted to offer amendments.

Mr. MANN. To present amendments; yes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. And I did say that I wanted to vote every one of them down.

Mr. MANN. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. This resolution——

Mr. MANN. Oh, do not take so much of my time.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Well, the gentleman ought not to refer to me unless he talks the facts.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has the time. I am not the one who limited it.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. But the gentleman's friend did.

Mr. MANN. Oh, not at all. The gentleman from Missouri limited the time.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I do not want to get into a controversy with the gentleman; but that is not correct, because debate was limited by consent of the House.

Mr. MANN. Oh, that is true.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Did I not ask for the longest limit of time desired on that side?

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken. I suggested that we have more than one day's debate on the proposition.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. But the gentleman has always been opposed to this measure, and I did not pay very much respect to his wishes in the matter.

Mr. MANN. That is all right; but do not take my time or bother me now.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I am not going to bother the gentleman. I want only to express my opinion.

Mr. MANN. I do not wonder that the gentleman gets restive when his resolution is under consideration.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. A Republican resolution, as I have already told the gentleman a hundred times, but I am supporting it.

Mr. MANN. Well, it is quite likely that the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, the chairman of the great Committee on the Election of the President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress, seeking for an opportunity to make fame for himself—running around and hunting for a form—it is very likely that he has picked up some Republican thunder. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] We have learned before this that that which we have discarded that side of the House joyfully embraces as something good and new. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. I prefer to discuss the resolution. The gentleman has plenty of time.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will give the gentleman as much time as I consume of his.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will wait until I finish, I will be very much obliged.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. If the gentleman does not want me to ask him a question when it is proper——

Mr. MANN. Oh, I would be very glad to let the gentleman ask me a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Oh, certainly; I always yield in the end, though I prefer to get through.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. The gentleman has consumed more time now than it would take to ask the question. He does not want me to ask him any question.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I will permit the gentleman to ask me a question. What is it?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. No; I will not ask any question. I am getting tired of that display, and I will get along without it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I learned long ago when I was in control of a bill to keep my temper. Gentlemen on that side of the House will have that lesson to learn in the course of time.

The gentleman has left out the direct vote of the people. What more? The resolution provides:

> The electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures.

Plural! How many legislatures does a State have, for God's sake? [Laughter and applause on Republican side.] Oh, no; that is not the fault of the printer, as some gentleman near me suggests. That is the fault of the gentleman who introduced the resolution. The resolution which formerly passed the House had the correct expression, providing that the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the legislature thereof, or of that State, but the gentleman from Missouri—I will apologize to the gentleman—I do not think the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] is the one who made the discovery, for it is quite likely, and I agree with him, that that was in the bill as it was presented in the distinguished body at the other end of the Capitol. But if my friend from Missouri had watched that distinguished body as closely as I have, he would have learned before this that it is not safe to rely on other legislative bodies either as to substance or as to form.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. It depends on who composed the body.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman has this side of the House now. Who composed the body I do not undertake to say. It is a fine-looking body of men, I will say, whom I see upon that side of the House, but their grammar is a little off. [Laughter and applause on Republican side.]

Then it says:

When vacancies happen—

in the representation of any State in the Senate the executive authority of such States shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. MANN. I would ask for five minutes more.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman whatever time I have.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 12 minutes remaining.

Mr. MANN. I will not want to take so much time.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I will yield whatever of that time the gentleman desires.

Mr. MANN. If I were writing that language I should have written—

When a vacancy happens in the representation of any State in the Senate the executive authority of such State shall issue a writ of election to fill such vacancy.

The statutes of the United States provide that when the plural or singular number is used in the statutes it shall apply to the other when applicable, and that often corrects mistakes like this of using the plural instead of the singular, but the statutes do not govern in the construction of the Constitution of the United States, and one would think that after being out, as they say, for 16 years they would discover that when they wished to say a vacancy they would say a vacancy instead of vacancies. There is vacancy enough now on that side without making it plural. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I prefer not; the gentleman has time. Now, I do not wish to be carping, but here is a constitutional amendment, and the last provision is—

This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as part of the Constitution.

The first principle of language is to reduce the number of words to express the thought to as few as possible. That is a principle which I know, though I do not always follow it.

Mr. JAMES. It does not apply to speeches, does it?

Mr. MANN. The provision ought to be—

This amendment shall not be construed to affect the election or term of any Senator.

And if my friend from Missouri was writing it and had his attention called to it, he would agree to it; but, of course, now he will feel compelled to stand by the provision. Mr. Speaker, but a few words more. In the first part the joint resolution provides, among other things, that—

In lieu of all of paragraph 1 of section 4 of said Article I, in so far as the same relates to any authority in Congress to make or alter regulations as to the times or manner of holding elections for Senators.

Think for a moment of the rhetorical expression of stating that it shall be "in lieu of all" of the paragraph, but really in lieu of only a part of it; but coming to the gist of it, what authority has Congress to say what part of the Constitution an amendment is "in lieu of"? The amendment, when it is agreed to by three-fourths of the States and becomes a part of the Constitution, is for the courts to determine as to its meaning. This part of the resolution is no part of the amendment. We may legislate here and say that a certain amendment is in place of the whole Constitution, but that is not before the legislatures of the States which ratify the amendment; but when the amendment is ratified it speaks for itself, and the courts, not Congress, will construe the part of the Constitution it is in lieu of. But the purpose of that, and that is the first time the provision in that form has appeared in any of these resolutions, the purpose of that resolution is to take out of the Constitution the power which Congress would otherwise have when it so desired to regulate the time and manner of holding elections for Senators. Ever since the Government was organized Congress has had the power to regulate the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives.

We have had the power to regulate the time and manner of conducting the election of Senators, not the place, because the place was supposed to be within the power of the State to fix as being the capital of the State, and it was not designed to give Congress the power to fix the capital of the State.

Now, under this amendment, as I read it, though there is some doubt, Congress will still have the power to regulate the time, and place, and manner, for holding elections for Members of Congress. Why is it proposed that Congress shall not have the same power over the election of Senators by the same electorate—probably at the same time? It ought to be. We have so provided in course of time that we have required, in effect, the election of electors at a fixed time, in fact, and their meeting at the same time. Through the power of Congress to regulate the election of Representatives, and the fear that that power might be exercised in course of time, most of the States have fixed their fall elections for Members of Congress at the same time. Senators ought to be elected at the same election that Members of the House are, and yet it is proposed to take away from Congress the power to control these elections and to place it absolutely in the hands of the States.

It is true that Congress has not exercised the power, but it often happens that when a superior body possesses a power it is not necessary to exercise it, because the inferior body acts with fairness and justice. Under this provision of the Constitution, if made as it stands in the resolution, Utah, Delaware, Rhode Island, Illinois, or Indiana, or New York, or any State in the Union, may make provisions which have never yet been heard of as to the election of Senators. I contend that under the wording of the amendment, as it now stands, the election of Senators by the people, that it does not require a direct vote of the people. If we had a central body to be composed of delegates to be elected from various subordinate bodies, it would often be the case that those delegates would be appointed by the executive committee of the lower body. No one would suppose from reading the rules of this House that it meant that the committees were to be elected, possibly, by ballot.

There is no provision here that Senators shall be elected by a ballot or by a vote even. We elect committees by resolution, not by ballot, and under this provision, if it should be put into the Constitution, there will come a time when some of the States will find other methods of electing Senators than by a direct vote of the people; and, if history should repeat itself, there would come times when from some of the Southern States Senators would be elected without a direct vote. Under this provision, in the carpetbag days of the South, some of the gentlemen in control of those States would have claimed that they had elected a Senator by the people if the governor issued a commission, without anything further. And remember that, under this, Congress has no control. I appeal to the gentlemen in power on that side of the House, that if you propose to amend the Constitution in this regard now before it comes up for construction, make it plain, so that those who come after may know what it means without court, judicial, or war proceedings.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I was about to ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] to yield me two minutes in which to reply to one question.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I stated a while ago to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] that after the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] delivered his speech there would be only one other speech on this side.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think I have a little time remaining.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say to the gentleman from Michigan, and to the gentleman from Missouri also, that I do not intend to make a speech, but I do think that the provision of the Constitution of the United States, one construction of which I gave, and which was contradicted point-blank by the gentleman from Illinois, ought to be read to the House, and I just ask for two minutes.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Yes; certainly, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois prophesied that the large States would force an amendment depriving the smaller States of their equal rights in the Senate. I said that the large States could not force upon a smaller State a constitutional amendment to deprive it of its equal suffrage in the Senate except with the consent of the smaller State. With this the gentleman from Illinois did not agree.

Here is Article V of the Constitution:

The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress; provided that no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article, and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.

[Applause.]

Mr. MANN. I read that very carefully before I made my remarks. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, there will be only one more speech made on this side in concluding this debate. I desire to use three or four minutes, if I may do so with propriety, in order to answer some things which were said here, about which I was not permitted to interrogate the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] while he was on the floor.

It is a great misfortune, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman who delivered that magnificent lecture to the House this evening had not lived in olden times and in his own happy style of English framed the Constitution of the United States in language so perfect that even a genius like himself would not dare attack it. [Laughter.] But he did not, and therefore we have got to try to get along in some old way with the Constitution which was handed down to us by those distinguished men who did frame it as best they could. [Laughter.]

The gentleman here this evening makes a great speech in behalf of the rights of the people and the rights of the States and the rights of the Constitution, and would lead us to believe that he is probably reluctant in opposing this measure because of the numerous and clerical grammatical errors to which he has called the attention of the House in a jocular and very instructive speech. [Laughter.]

The gentleman lauds and presents as practically perfect and free from criticism, even at his hands, the resolution offered in the last Congress by my distinguished colleague, Mr. LLOYD. But the gentleman will bear with me when I say this, that when the committee, at that time presided over by a distinguished Republican from West Virginia, Mr. Gaines, brought in a report and recommended to this House that that resolution should pass the gentleman from Illinois arose in his place and objected to the passage of the resolution which he to-day tells us is absolutely perfect, because of a misprint in the Government Printing Office of one word—the addition of an "s." Is not that true? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I did not say it was perfect.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. But the gentleman objected to it for the reason that it contained an "s" when there ought not to have been one, and that was the only objection made.

Mr. MANN. I objected to it when I discovered an "s" on the word "amendment," and that was enough to put me on guard as to the rest of the language.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Yes; and the gentleman is "on guard" and has been for some time. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. And will be for some time. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will not discuss that. Of course what I am now going to say has no application on earth, Mr. Speaker, but I read a long time ago in some poetry—I think Pope's incomparable poems; no; it was in Cowper—a couplet that sometimes forces itself into my mind. When I see a gentleman laboring so arduously and earnestly, apparently, for public welfare and yet one who is never able to find anything on earth quite good enough for him to take at the command of the people, sometimes I can not help, to save my soul, having that couplet flash through my mind. The poet wrote:

> With smooth dissimulation skilled, to grace
> A devil's purpose with an angel's face.

[Laughter.]

It has no application here, and I would not have quoted the language if it had not been that the gentleman has criticized my grammar, and I wanted him to understand that if I do not know all about grammar, I do know some things about the application of poetry. [Laughter.]

But the gentleman said that this resolution is woefully bad because it reads:

When vacancies happen in the representation of any State in the Senate, the executive authority of such State shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies—

And he criticizes that word "happen" as an error.

But the gentleman forgets that this old Constitution which he is guarding so sacredly from the amendments which the people have been pleading for for 40 years uses that identical language:

When vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies—

Word for word the language in the resolution now pending before the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

He forgets also that in the second clause of the second paragraph in the Constitution the identical language is found which is found in this resolution, where it says:

And the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature—

Exactly what we have here, except——

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Oh, I know you find a surplus "s," and as long as the gentleman is on guard he will always find the "s's" in all reform measures, and an "s" is such an obstacle that that great leader of Republicanism in the city of Chicago can not get over it.

But let me say to you, sir, if conditions had existed 130 years ago that exist to-day those distinguished patriots of this country never would have written into the Constitution some of its yet cherished provisions. At that time the human mind had never been traduced by a thought so foul as that a great people would ever stoop to such practices as we learn are sometimes found in great States and in the legislatures of those States. I heard the gentleman mention the State of Illinois awhile ago, and I thought, "What a great State it is; in fact, it has made more history in the last six months than the Southern Confederacy made in four years." [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Illinois made more history in the four years of the Civil War than the Southern Confederacy did.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I hope I will have no interruptions. I did not intend to consume any time. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is with some degree of embarrassment that I undertake to close this debate on this very important subject, for I speak without any preparation and without previous determination. I shall not waste much of the 15 minutes allowed me in answer to the criticisms of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] as to the phraseology of this bill. Some of these criticisms have already been answered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER]; but it may not be amiss to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois again to the fact that an accurate and careful reading of the Constitution itself might have saved him from the mistake of one of his criticisms. He complained that while much has been said here of the direct vote of the people, yet when we framed the terms of the resolution we provided only that "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof." Had he remembered—because he has undoubtedly read—the second section of Article I of the Constitution, he would have remembered that it is in this language:

The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second year by the people of the several States.

Nothing is said there of the direct vote, though Representatives are thus elected, and there is no more necessity for it here than there.

But I desire to come to the real propositions that are here involved. It is perhaps unnecessary at this late day to say anything as to the merits of the major proposition; and yet it may not be amiss to note with reference to the eulogy of the gentleman's party that the only voices that have been raised against the major proposition to elect Senators by direct vote of the people have been Republican. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

No Democrat on this floor has criticised that proposition. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is peculiarly solicitous for State sovereignty and State rights, and he assumes that because you provide a different method of electing Senators you have struck a deathblow to State sovereignty. I have never been able to follow that logic. As pointed out by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], you can not change, without the consent of each State, the equal representation of the States in the Senate, and simply changing the method of electing Senators does not in the slightest degree do away with the power of the States themselves as sovereignties.

Of course, if you accept the gentleman's premise, that one amendment of the Constitution necessarily means untold amendments to the Constitution, why, then, that conclusion of his, or any other conclusion, would be entirely logical. But that has not been the history of amendments to the Constitution, and there is nothing now to warrant the assumption.

But the question that is really interesting this House, and the question that I desire to come to, is not the major proposition, the election of Senators by direct vote of the people, but it is that proposition involved in the substitute offered by the gentleman from Michigan, as to whether we should not have in the Constitution, as it is proposed to be amended, the power in the Federal Government to control the election of United States Senators. That is the real question at issue here.

Now, if it were possible, as suggested repeatedly by the gentlemen on this side, to provide for direct vote of Senators by the people without changing the present power that exists in the Congress of the United States relative to the election of Senators, I would agree that it was highly improper to bring into this question another question about which there is such a division of opinion. But bear in mind this basic fact, that the very moment that you provide by constitutional amendment that Senators shall be elected by direct vote of the people instead of by the legislatures of the States, that moment, unless you make further provision, you have enlarged the power of the Government of the United States over the election of Senators of the United States.

I repeat, that the moment you change the form of the election from that by the legislature to that by direct vote of the people, that moment you have enlarged the power of the Federal Government over such elections. The power that exists to-day under the Constitution as to the election of Senators and Representatives, while in the same language, is not, in a practical real sense, the same power.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. For a question only.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman will recollect that the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD] in the last Congress, and which was reported and which I have offered as a substitute, contains no reference to section 4, Article I. Would the gentleman hold that that resolution extended the power of the Federal Government?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I simply answer that it is not material as to what was provided in any former resolution. The material thing is what we shall provide in this amendment. I have not time in the 15 minutes to discuss the various bills that have been introduced. I say to you, in my judgment, that if you are not to enlarge the power of the Federal Government you must add something besides the simple provision as to the method of electing Senators.

The power of Congress over elections for Representatives in Congress is practically complete. While Congress may not prescribe the qualification of voters, and while that right is left entirely with the States, subject only to the provisions of the fifteenth amendment, yet Congress can, by regulating the "manner" of holding these elections, give to the Federal Government complete control, as it actually did during the reconstruction period. As to election of Senators, Congress can now give to the Federal Government no such powers. Practically speaking, its power over their election is so slight as to be negligible. But the sole change from election of Senators by the legislatures to an election by direct vote carries with it an enlargement of power. This it is that brings us face to face with the two propositions. The proposition on that side of the House is that we shall enlarge that power by limiting the amendment to the change to direct vote of the people so as to make it coequal and coextensive with the power of the Federal Government now as to the election of Members of Congress. The proposition on this side is that we should not give to the National Government the power over the election of Senators. That is the real issue clean-cut, and there can be no doubt about it.

What is the history? The history of the provision of the Constitution in regard to both Members of the House and the Senate is that it was put in there not with the idea that the Federal Government should actually supervise the manner and method of holding the election of Members of Congress or of the Senate, but that in the event of the State failing to provide the machinery and method for election, a fear that was then prominent and warranted, then the United States should exercise that power. But when the matter came to be construed as to the power in regard to Members of Congress, the Supreme Court of the United States held that the Congress of the United States had the power, without regard to the failure of the State, to regulate the method of electing Representatives to the Congress of the United States.

We in the South have had confronting us a very grave and very serious problem—a problem that, according to the best judgment of the southern people, involved the supremacy of the white race in those States. Out of much of turmoil, out of much that might not be defended in the cold forum of law, has come now a solution that has been upheld by the courts, and that to-day is making for the future prosperity and safety of the entire land. We are not willing, many of us, to endanger that status, believing it to be most vital, by giving a power as to elections more extensive than now belongs to the Federal Government.

I am one of those men who believe that the day has gone by when we will ever see the power of the National Government enforced as it was enforced during reconstruction days; but we do not believe that it is essential to this question to augment that power and to give additional opportunity for its wrong use.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks what reason in logic can be given why a different rule should apply to the election of Members of the House and Members of the Senate. I might answer him by saying that to-day there exists a different rule in regard to the power of the Federal Government as to electors who elect a President and Members of the House of Representatives.

According to cold logic and theory, if the Federal Government should have power to control the election of Members of this House, which is necessary to its continued existence, it ought also to have power to control the election of electors who select a President of the United States, also necessary to the continuance of its existence. There is also a reason why the States in the election of Senators should not be subject to the same control that the individual election of Members is subject to. The States in selecting Senators do act in a sovereign capacity. They send Senators not simply as Members of the National Legislature, but they send them, in a sense, as ambassadors of a sovereign State, and to my mind it seems utterly foolish to say that you are willing to trust the people of the States to select these Senators, to have power to select them in the broad sense, and yet you are not willing to trust them with the arrangement of the manner and method of holding the election. Either the one position is not warranted or the other is not.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. For a question.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Suppose the time should come when any State should become dissatisfied with the way the Federal Government was being carried on and should refuse to provide for the election of a Senator?

Mr. SHERLEY. Frankly I say that if you gentlemen are dealing with it from that single position, men on this side of the House ought not to have, and I believe would not have, any objection to a provision that gave to the Federal Government control, predicated upon the basic fact only of the State having failed to act; but I say to you that there is no more danger to-day of the States failing to act than of any other unheard-of event.

At the time that that fear was entertained, and at the time when that fear was potent enough to put into the Constitution the provision we find there, there were many who believed the Constitution would never be ratified by the States; there were many who believed it would not last even if ratified; that the States, with their jealousy of each other, would undermine its powers; but no man to-day, after a hundred years of national existence, but realizes that the Nation as a nation is here to stay; that it will never die for failure of the component parts of it to elect Senators to the Congress of the United States. [Applause.] Such a proposition is unthinkable.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question, purely for information. Does he agree with his colleague that this resolution will not be approved by the legislatures of the Southern States if this provision limiting the power of the Federal Government is not placed in it?

Mr. SHERLEY. Why, I have no opinion to express. In my own State we have a suffrage without limitation of any sort, and the question would not be vital there except as public opinion is influenced by public opinion in sister Southern States.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have still a few minutes remaining.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Then, I yield the remaining five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have no right to speak for these States, but gentlemen have argued that we were imperiling the amendment by putting in it the provisions that we have.

I say to you that, in my judgment, it is more likely to receive the approval of the necessary States in the present form than in the form proposed in the substitute of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG]. That is simply my opinion for what it may be worth.

Mr. JACKSON. One question more, Is it fair, either to the minority party in this House or the success of this great principle for which the gentleman has been contending, to impose upon the Northern States the burden of explaining to the hundreds of thousands of colored men who do really vote the great principle which the gentleman has been endeavoring to debate here to-day? [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. My answer to the gentleman is simply this: We have on this side presented a proposition that we believe ought to be adopted. We force no man here, and can force no man, to accept our view. If a majority of the membership of this House see fit to amend this bill as the gentleman would like, well and good. I am still sufficiently in favor of the principle to vote for the constitutional amendment even in the changed form, but it is certainly as fair for us to present our proposition as it is for that side to present theirs, and I further say to the gentleman that we are not making necessary any explanation on the part of the gentleman to any person, white or black, in the North. We do not by this amendment change in one single particular the rights of the negro as a citizen of the United States. We do not in any sense interfere with the protection of those rights under the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments, and I would say——

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Oregon?

Mr. SHERLEY. I decline to yield—but we do say this, that we believe it to be unwise to give to the Federal Government an enlarged grant of power touching the manner of holding elections in the States. We do not believe that such grant of power is necessary, and we are not willing, not believing it to be necessary, to give it. There has been nothing in the history of the country that warrants the belief that it is necessary in order to preserve the Government, and that, to my mind, is the only valid reason that it should be granted.

Mr. LAFFERTY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Oregon?

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman from Kentucky does not yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky declines to yield.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have, as I stated, made this speech without preparation, with the consequent confusion of thought that results therefrom.

In conclusion, let me say to the membership of this House that I believe it easy for men to find excuses to vote against this amendment, but to the man who actually, sincerely, fundamentally believes that you will improve the conditions of service to be had in the Senate of the United States by putting the power of electing Senators directly in the hands of the people, to such a man I say there is nothing in the form of the amendment as offered here to-day that ought to make him pause for one moment, and to the Members on that side of the aisle, as well as on this, who actually believe, not nominally believe, in the principles of government by the people, I appeal for a support of the amendment. [Loud and continued applause.]

The SPEAKER. Under the agreement the previous question operates on the resolution and on all of the amendments. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

By Mr. YOUNG of Michigan:

Amend as follows: Strike out, on page 1, the language beginning in line 7, as follows: "And in lieu of all of paragraph 1 of section 4 of said Article I, in so far as the same relates to any authority in Congress to make or alter regulations as to the times or manner of holding elections for Senators."

And strike out, on page 2, the language beginning in line 9, as follows:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators shall be as prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, at this point, in order to save time, I will call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it not in order to vote on the substitute?

The SPEAKER. The vote will be taken on the substitute last. The Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the amendment will answer "aye," and those opposed will answer "no"; those present and not voting will answer "present."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 123, nays 189, answered "present" 2, not voting 75, as follows:

Mr. CONRY (against) with Mr. SELLS (in favor).

Mr. ELLERBE (against) with Mr. CAMPBELL (in favor).

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. CARY:

On page 8 add: "That there be and there is hereby proposed the following amendment to the Constitution, which, when ratified as the Constitution prescribes, shall become effective as a part of the Constitution, as follows:

"That there be, and there is hereby, proposed the following amendment to the Constitution, which, when ratified as the Constitution prescribes, shall become and be effective as part of the Constitution, as follows:

"'SEC. 1. Members and Delegates to the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States shall be elected after the passage of this bill for a term of four years.

"'SEC. 2. Said election shall take place at the time and on the day prescribed by law for the casting of the popular vote for President of the United States, and in the manner prescribed by law by the different States and Territories.'"

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. MANN:

Amend page 2, line 4, by inserting after the word "by" the following, "a direct vote of."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment, also offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 2, lines 7 and 8, by striking out the word "legislatures" and inserting the word "legislature."

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I believe I would like to see the gentleman from Illinois gain one victory in this contest, and I therefore hope this amendment will be accepted. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 2, line 15, by striking out the words "that the legislature of any State may empower," and, in line 16, by striking out the word "to" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "shall."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment, also by Mr. MANN.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 2, line 18, by striking out the words "so" and "as."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the following amendment be proposed to the legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said legislatures, shall become and be a part of the Constitution, namely: In lieu of the first and second paragraphs of section 3 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States of America, the following shall be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution:

"'SEC. 3. That the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, who shall be elected by a direct vote of the people thereof for a term of six years, and each Senator shall have one vote; a plurality of the votes cast for candidates for Senator shall elect, and the electors shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislature.

"'When vacancies happen, by resignation or otherwise, in the representation of any State in the Senate, the same shall be filled for the unexpired term thereof in the same manner as is provided for the election of Senators in paragraph 1: Provided, That the executive thereof shall make temporary appointment until the next general or special election, held in accordance with the statutes or constitution of such State.'

"This amendment shall not be so construed as to affect the election or term of any Senator chosen before it becomes valid as a part of the Constitution."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute.

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the joint resolution.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. The yeas and nays!

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to detain the membership of this House here by calling for the yeas and nays, because I believe the House is practically a unit on this measure. But if gentlemen want a yea-and-nay vote, there is no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 14, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

During the reading the following occurred:

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, there is so much confusion I am unable to hear what the Clerk is reading. It is not the fault of the Clerk. What is he reading?

The SPEAKER. He is supposed to be reading the Journal. The point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois is sustained, and the House will be in order.

Mr. CANNON. Has there been a demand made that the Journal shall be read in full, rather than a statement? If so, does that include the reading of the names of Members who voted?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk was not reading the names of Members who voted.

Mr. CANNON. I do not care at this time to demand the reading of the names. Of course I could, but it seems to me an exceedingly long Journal.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk was reading the Journal in the usual way and will proceed.

The Clerk completed the reading of the Journal, and it was approved.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

The SPEAKER announced the following change of reference:

A bill (H. R. 2900) to authorize the acceptance by the United States of the gift of the Nathan Straus Pasteurized Milk Laboratory; Committee on Military Affairs discharged, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Resolution (H. Res. 70) providing for a committee to investigate the method of enforcement of the antitrust act and other matters; Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice discharged, and referred to the Committee on Rules.

PRINTING RESOLUTIONS IN THE RECORD.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print the following resolution in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a certain memorial, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution asking for an investigation of the Taylor system of shop management.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. HARDWICK. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Iowa, one of the able new Members of the House, is probably not familiar with the practice of the House, which is not to print memorials in the RECORD. If it is once begun there is no limit, and if once begun the RECORD becomes so bulky that we never can find the thing we want on account of the number of memorials.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman from Iowa if this is a memorial or a resolution?

Mr. PEPPER. It is a resolution.

The SPEAKER. A resolution with a preamble.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that it requires unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to print it in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Has it been introduced?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. PEPPER. It is being introduced now.

Mr. MANN. I object; the proper method of introducing it is to put it in the basket.

COMMITTEE ON LABOR.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 88.

Resolved, That the Committee on Labor be authorized to have such printing and binding done for the use of the committee as may be necessary for the transaction of its business during the Sixty-second Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was considered and agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON THE POST OFFICE AND POST ROADS.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

House resolution 89.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be authorized to have such printing and binding done as may be necessary for the use of the committee during the Sixty-second Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was considered and agreed to.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I also ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 87.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be permitted to sit during the sessions of the House and during the recess of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

RESIDENT COMMISSIONERS, PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 86.

Resolved, That the right of debate be extended to the two Resident Commissioners from the Philippine Islands.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suppose that is during this Congress.

Mr. GARRETT. This Congress could not bind another. The language is the language used in the resolution that passed before.

Mr. MANN. They obtained the right to debate in two Congresses on that, yet I have no objection.

Mr. GARRETT. They got the right to debate in the second Congress merely because objection was not made.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill and joint resolutions of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 745. An act providing for the erection of a statue to Thomas Jefferson at Washington, D. C.;

S. J. Res. 8. Joint resolution authorizing the selection of a site and the erection of a statue of Alexander Hamilton in Washington, D. C.; and

S. J. Res. 5. Joint resolution to create a joint committee to continue the consideration of the revision and codification of the laws of the United States.

PUBLICITY OF ELECTION CONTRIBUTIONS.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 29585) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected," which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected," approved June 25, 1910, be, and the same is hereby, amended by repealing all of sections 5 and 6 of said act and enacting the following new sections in lieu thereof, so that said act as amended shall read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That the treasurer of every such political committee shall, not more than 15 days and not less than 10 days next before an election at which Representatives in Congress are to be elected in two or more States, file in the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives at Washington, D. C., with said Clerk an itemized detailed statement; and on each sixth day thereafter until such election said treasurer shall file with said Clerk a supplemental itemized detailed statement. Each of said statements shall conform to the requirements of the following section of this act, except that the supplemental statement herein required need not contain any item of which publicity is given in a previous statement. Each of said statements shall be full and complete, and shall be signed and sworn to by said treasurer.

"It shall also be the duty of said treasurer to file a similar statement with the Clerk within 30 days after such election, such final statement also to be signed and sworn to by said treasurer and to conform to the requirements of the following section of this act. The statement so filed with the Clerk of the House shall be preserved by him for 15 months and shall be a part of the public records of his office and shall be open to public inspection.

"SEC. 6. That the statements required by the preceding section of this act shall state:

"First. The name and address of each person, firm, association, or committee who or which has contributed, promised, loaned, or advanced to such political committee, or any officer, member, or agent thereof, either in one or more items, money or its equivalent of the aggregate amount or value of $100 or more, and the amount or sum contributed, promised, loaned, or advanced by each.

"Second. The aggregate sum contributed, promised, loaned, or advanced to such political committee, or to any officer, member, or agent thereof, in amounts of less than $100.

"Third. The total sum of all contributions, promises, loans, and advances received by such political committee or any officer, member, or agent thereof.

"Fourth. The name and address of each person, firm, association, or committee to whom such political committee, or any officer, member, or agent thereof, has distributed, disbursed, contributed, loaned, advanced, or promised any sum of money or its equivalent of the amount or value of $100 or more, stating the amount or sum distributed, disbursed, contributed, loaned, advanced, or promised to each, and the purpose thereof.

"Fifth. The aggregate sum distributed, disbursed, contributed, loaned, advanced, or promised by such political committee, or any officer, member, or agent thereof, where the amount or value of such distribution, disbursement, loan, advance, or promise to any one person, firm, association, or committee in one or more items is less than $100.

"Sixth. The total sum disbursed, distributed, contributed, loaned, advanced, or promised by such political committee, or any officer, member, or agent thereof."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill just reported?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri if he has consulted the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] in reference to debate and amendment of the bill?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman, I will say that I had a brief conversation with the gentleman from Michigan yesterday, and it was my purpose to appeal to him before this request was made to know what arrangement, if any, we could make about debate. My understanding with the gentleman was that there would be no objection to this course, although he did not expressly say so.

Mr. AUSTIN. How about amendments to the bill?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Of course opportunity will be given to amend.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. What, if any, opportunity will be allowed for debate?

Mr. MANN. That is what we are trying to ascertain.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I wanted to agree with the gentleman from Michigan as to the length of time for debate.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let me ask the gentleman why he does not put this bill upon the Unanimous Consent Calendar? If this request be granted, will it not practically overthrow or destroy the practice under the Unanimous Consent Calendar?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I think not.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me to make a suggestion in reference to that, I will state that this is the only bill now on the calendar except the reciprocity bill. This is on the House Calendar. A call of committees will bring this bill before the House at once; so it is in a little different situation than it would be if there were a number of bills on the calendar and unanimous consent were being asked for its consideration.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Under the call of committees, perhaps, the question of right to debate might enter into consideration.

Mr. MANN. Under a call of committee, of course, this being on the House Calendar, the gentleman from Missouri would have the right at any time to move the previous question, which, if carried, would cut off debate and amendments. I understood that the gentleman from Missouri had or would agree to some arrangement for a proper time for debate on the bill, giving the time on this side to the control of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] and on that side to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. That is my purpose, and no other purpose.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I do not know how much time is required on this side. If gentlemen would indicate what they want, my impression is it will be found there will not be very much demand for time.

Mr. MANN. I would suggest that there be an hour on a side, with the right to offer amendments during that time, and either have the amendments pending then or else by unanimous consent read the bill under the five-minute rule for amendment.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. On our side that will be perfectly satisfactory to me.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to modify my request for unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill by adding to it that general debate proceed for two hours, and during that time any gentleman having the floor may offer amendment, the amendment to be considered as pending, and at the expiration of general debate the previous question be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments to passage, one-half of the time of debate to be controlled by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] and one-half by myself, and I will say to him in that connection, we can yield more than one-half of the time if he has demand for it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks that the bill be considered by unanimous consent; that general debate proceed for two hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] and one-half by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], during which time any gentleman who speaks shall have the right to offer amendment, and that they shall all be considered as pending, and at the end of two hours the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments to final passage. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, pending that request, I desire to give notice that as soon as this bill is disposed of I intend to call up the bill to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama gives notice that as soon as this corrupt-practices bill be disposed of he will call up for consideration the Canadian reciprocity bill. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, during the last Congress this House passed a publicity bill which was approved by the President of the United States on the 25th day of last June. The bill which passed the House, by practically a unanimous vote, carried a provision requiring publicity of campaign contributions and disbursements to be made before elections, as well as after elections. After the bill passed the House it was amended in another body by striking out the provisions requiring publicity before elections. The purpose of the bill now pending is to restore to the law the provisions of publicity before elections as well as after elections. The changes proposed in existing law by this bill, in addition to restoring the feature of publicity before elections, enlarges somewhat the requirements of publicity before elections. As the bill passed the House in the last Congress, it required the first statement to be made by political committees to be made not more than 15 nor less than 10 days next preceding the day of election. This bill goes a little further and requires a like statement, a supplemental statement, to be made each 6 days after the filing of the first statement until the day of election. These are the changes proposed in section 5 of the law. The other section proposed to be amended is section 6. As the law now stands, while committees are required to give publicity of the names and addresses of every person, firm, or association who contributed $100 or more, the amount contributed is not required by express language to be shown. It was the intention of the committee, and I believe the House so understood it, that the bill as it passed the House covers that point, but I do not think it does. In order to make it clear at least, the amendment proposed to section 6 of the existing law requires, in all cases where the amount contributed is $100 or more, that the committee shall give the names and places of residence of such contributors, together with a statement of the amount contributed by each, and another clause of the section requires similar publicity in reference to disbursements where the amount distributed to one person or committee is as much as $100. The amended law, if this bill should pass, would require the name and address of each person or committee to be stated in all instances where the amount contributed or received is $100 or more. These are the changes proposed. They do not change the general character of the law, but they seek to make it clearer and more efficient.

Mr. KENDALL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] yield to the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. MURDOCK. In this bill is provision made for the publicity of accounts from a congressional committee in a single district? As the gentleman knows, we have in this country the large congressional committee, and in addition we have smaller congressional committees. Now, does this bill provide for publicity of accounts in the smaller congressional districts in a single district?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Answering the gentleman from Kansas, I will say that the bill does not contain provisions relating to the matters suggested by him.

Mr. MURDOCK. Why is that provision omitted?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will say to the gentleman we are trying to draft and enact into law a measure of national scope and importance. We doubt the propriety and the legality of congressional action which would deal purely with a State matter. I believe that if this bill is passed the State of Kansas and the State of Missouri will adopt laws fashioned after it, requiring publicity from the committee, which the gentleman speaks of, before and after election. We deem it a matter of purely State control and not of national control, and therefore no legislation along the line suggested is attempted in this proposed amendment to our national publicity law.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I do.

Mr. KENDALL. The operation of this law, then, when enacted would be confined entirely to the national congressional committees of the respective parties?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. It would be confined entirely to committees which seek to influence elections in two or more States. It would be limited to the two principal committees of the two great parties.

Mr. KENDALL. Or the three great parties.

Mr. MANN. And the national committee, and every newspaper that circulates in more than one State.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. There is some question about that; we do not think so.

Mr. KENDALL. May I make this suggestion to the gentleman from Missouri? I did not understand the distinction which the gentleman deduced between the national congressional committee and the control of committees organized in the various congressional districts. I think there is not any differentiation between the two so far as respects their duties to report to the public as to contributions made and as to disbursements.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I fully agree with the gentleman. I think there is a doubt as to the power to compel them to do it. We have the power, I think, to compel a committee operating in more than one State, but I do not think that we have the power to provide for such publicity by committees whose operations are confined wholly to one State or one district.

Mr. KENDALL. Has the Congress any power to compel a Representative in Congress to make a report of disbursements in his campaign?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I have not given special consideration to that question; but, conceding the power, I doubt the wisdom of such congressional interference with matters wholly within the jurisdiction and the power of the States to regulate and control.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri why it was that the amount of publication was fixed at $100?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, this bill does not contain any such limitation.

Mr. CULLOP. It says $100 or more.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the bill provides that where the amount contributed is $100 or more the committee shall give the name, address, and amount contributed by such contributor.

Mr. CULLOP. Why was it fixed, then, at any sum?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. The reason is obvious, and I am sure my good friend from Indiana will agree with me. To require publicity as to each item might require such an endless amount of bookkeeping as would become cumbersome and destroy the very purpose of publicity.

Mr. CULLOP. Let me put this kind of case: A large manufacturer desires to contribute a larger sum. He employs 2,000 men. Suppose he gives each one of those men $99 and has him contribute it in his name? Now, are you killing that kind of evil with this kind of bill? Such a thing as that could be done, and has been done, and I fear will be done again.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, may I answer that suggestion?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] yield to the other gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Yes; I always yield with pleasure to my colleague from Missouri.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] that if any plutocrat were to distribute a number of single sums around among individuals in that way, to be contributed by them, it would be in fact a contribution by him, and it would have to be published as though it were a single sum.

Mr. CULLOP. Yes; but the books of the committee or of the Clerk of the House of Representatives would not show that fact, and I am desirous of having this bill so perfected that it would reach that kind of condition and punish that kind of violator of the law.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I am in hearty sympathy with the thought and the desire of the gentleman from Indiana, but I have given a great deal of consideration to this measure, and I believe it is now in the most available shape it can be put in, if we wish to give effect to the desire of Congress and respond to the demand of the people, and I fear that if we attempt by this law to go as far as some gentlemen desire we may so burden it as to destroy the law by its own weight.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, Mr. Speaker, let me submit another question to the gentleman: Could you not have put a provision in there whereby, when the report of the contribution to the committee was made, an affidavit would follow or accompany it, setting forth that contributions had been made in the name of other persons for some particular individual or corporation?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. That would be practically to contradict the provisions of the law as it is written. The law requires them to make an itemized, detailed statement, giving the names of the contributors, but where contributions are made in sums less than $100 the aggregate is reported, and not the various items.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. HARDY. The question I wanted to ask was this: You have seemingly a very far-reaching provision for the filing of the statement of contributions with the Clerk of the House of Representatives. What I wanted to know is whether there is any method by which that will become the property of the general public? Has anybody and everybody the right to inspect these reports when made, and may they be published in the newspapers?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Allow me to say to the gentleman that the pending amendment expressly provides these reports shall be filed in the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, to be held by said Clerk as public documents and open to public inspection at all times.

Mr. HARDY. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. That is in the law now and will be preserved in the law if this bill passes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I desire to ask the gentleman if there is anything in the existing law or in the bill which he has reported from his committee that provides that the contributor shall identify himself, and that the treasurer of the campaign committee shall ascertain the identity of the contributor?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. The committee has never deemed it necessary to do that, hence there is no such requirement in the bill. I am sure, answering the gentleman's question further, that nobody would contribute to the Democratic campaign fund who is ashamed to give his true name, and I do not believe any contributor to the other political party would conceal his name and identity.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I think the gentleman will acknowledge that some person desirous of contributing might make it known to the chairman of a congressional committee that he did wish to contribute, and he would intimate that contributions would come in due course of time that might be sent in to the treasurer on letters typewritten, signed "Tom," "Dick," "Harry," "John," and "William," and the treasurer would have no way, except as he might suspect, to know where it came from, and yet he would publish the statement that he received the contributions from these persons, who might be mere myths.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, this law seeks to control the action and conduct of the political committee and not of the individual who makes the contribution.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Ought there not to be a provision to make it practicable to determine who does actually contribute?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. If the committees will comply with the law as it is proposed to be amended in this bill, I believe it will give to the people what they desire and will give effective publicity to campaign contributions. I think that answers the gentleman's question.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. MANN. We passed in the last Congress the law which it is now proposed to amend. Will the gentleman indicate exactly what changes are now proposed in sections 5 and 6, and in what respect it is different from the bill as we passed it in the House before?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I am sure the gentleman from Illinois was not in his seat—where he generally is, sometimes to my great annoyance—when I made the statement just a few minutes ago.

Mr. MANN. I saw that the gentleman was talking, but he was talking to that side of the House, and we on this side of the House could not hear him.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Then I will explain it to the gentleman's side of the House. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from Illinois, I desire to say that the publicity bill as it passed the House in the last Congress carried a provision requiring publicity to be given not more than 15 nor less than 10 days next before the election, but no other publicity before the election. That feature was stricken out in the Senate. This bill seeks not only to restore the provision which was in the bill as it passed the House last year, but to add to it the requirement that, in addition to the first statement required to be filed, the same committee shall every six days thereafter until the election file a similar supplemental statement containing all items not contained in statements previously filed. That, I believe, is the only change made in section 5.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me, it is perfectly plain that if the treasurer filed his statement 15 days before the election, then he would have to file two supplemental statements.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. MANN. If he filed his statement 10 days before the election, then he would have to file but one supplemental statement, and if he filed it 11 days before the election, then he would have to make no statement during the 5 days next preceding the election,

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. Would it not be better to require the supplemental statement to be filed at a fixed time before the election? This provision gives a chance to juggle about the time, if there is anything to that.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will say to the gentleman that under this provision of the bill it is possible to file the last statement as much as six days before the election; but that gives six days in which the newspapers can ventilate the contents of the statement. It gives six days for publication and discussion on the stump and through the weekly press, and it seems to me that is about as effective as we can make it.

Mr. KENDALL. Does it not also give six days for the use of a large corruption fund that will not be known about by the public press?

Mr. CULLOP. I should like to make one suggestion.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Will the gentleman wait until I finish with the gentleman from Illinois?

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. The gentleman from Illinois had asked me a question, and I was replying to it.

Mr. MANN. Waiving that for the present, if I may ask a few more questions in reference to section 6, as I understand the changes in section 6 in the existing law they first require the amounts contributed to be stated?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Where the amount is over $100.

Mr. MANN. Where it is over $100. I notice that the gentleman has changed the word "total" to "aggregate" in some places. Is that for the purpose of making a change in the meaning?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I made those changes because it occurred to me that the word "aggregate" was the more appropriate word to use where it is used, and using the word "total" at the end of the paragraph. If the gentleman convinces me that that is wrong, I will be glad to change the word.

Mr. MANN. I asked the question because of the change in the wording, striking out the word "total" in one place and leaving it in in another.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I had the purpose in mind which I have stated to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I think they both mean the same thing.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I do. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana for a short question. I hope gentlemen will not prolong this, because I want to yield some time to the other side.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to suggest that in line 6 the word "sixth" be stricken out and the word "third" inserted, so that it will read "every 3 days after they report 15 days before election."

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will say to the gentleman that he can offer such an amendment, and I shall not oppose it. I think it is possible to have too much. I realize that this measure is not perfect, and the only question is whether the gentleman can make it more nearly perfect, and I hope he can. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts for a question.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri was a member of the committee in the last Congress and assisted in the preparation of the bill which was reported at that time. Now, that bill provided for a preliminary report not more than 15 days and not less than 10 days before the election. As I understand it, the bill of the gentleman provides that after that report there shall be another and possibly two subsequent reports. It occurs to me, if I may suggest to the gentleman, the difficulty in drafting the bill in the last Congress, in which I participated with the gentleman from Missouri, was in fixing upon a proper time for this preliminary report. It did not seem to us that it would be wise to have a succession of preliminary reports. Why would it not be better, instead of imposing this burden on the political committees, if it is thought that 15 or 10 days before election is too early, to require one preliminary report to be made, say, 5 days before the election? That would open it up to discussion, and it seems to me that the advantage of other preliminary reports prior to that report immediately before election would be very slight.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Answering the gentleman, I will say that the objection I have to it is the same objection that governed me and the gentleman from Massachusetts when we agreed on the phraseology of the first bill, introduced a few years ago, making the period not less than 10 days before election. The idea is to give at least 10 days when the preliminary report shall be filed, 10 days of publicity through all the newspapers, and the nearer we get down to the date of election the more impossible would it be for the weekly newspapers, which go into all the homes, to handle the matter.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. The gentleman stated that the object of the bill was to control the great congressional committees. Is there anything in this bill which would prohibit these committees from accepting contributions from corporations?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. In this bill; no. It was expressly omitted for the reason that I participated somewhat in the enactment of the law a few years ago which makes it a crime, punishable by imprisonment, for corporations to contribute to campaign funds.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. KOPP. In the present law, section 6, subdivision 4, it is provided that the names must be given of each person who has received a payment of $10 or more. I notice that in the gentleman's bill he has increased that amount to $100. Will the gentleman state the purpose of the increase in amount?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I will be glad to do so. In this I confess that the judgment of the committee may be in error, but the thought that inspired us was that to require the great national committees of either party or the congressional national committee to give name and address of each person who gives the committee or who receives from the committee $10 would require such an endless amount of bookkeeping that it would be entirely too cumbersome. That is the only reason for the change referred to.

Mr. KOPP. Will not this open the door to fraud wider than the old law? It is well known that entries of disbursements of $99 will be made, whereas there could not be very substantial sums or payments in less sums than $10. It seems to me that we could waive the necessity for greater bookkeeping in order to get greater purity of elections.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. My answer is the same that I made to the gentleman from Indiana a few moments ago. While it is possible, I can not conceive that the gentlemen who compose the great committees are going to juggle with the law by giving the committee in a certain State or district several items of $99.95 each in order to evade the law. I will say that if they do, if such a practice should prevail, I will gladly join in an amendment that will cure it.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman for information whether the report of each of the committees after the last election was of any great length?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Oh, I think not of any great length.

Mr. KOPP. Then it seems to me that the fear that the bookkeeping will be complicated is unfounded.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. The gentleman understands that in these campaigns frequently there are several thousand contributions.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Did the committee of which the gentleman is chairman take into consideration the great importance of having a publication of contributions which secures the nominations of men? The nomination to-day in many localities is of the very first importance, and the money is contributed there to corrupt the electorate.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I fully appreciate that statement and agree with what the gentleman says, but that is a matter, I think, that ought to be controlled by State legislatures and not by Congress. I do not want to undertake to go into the domain of a State or to encroach upon the State jurisdiction.

Mr. COOPER. I think the point raised by my colleague [Mr. KOPP] is a very strong one. What would prevent a man of many millions from giving to a hundred of his employees or a thousand of them $50 or $90 apiece, without any record being made public? It will not do to say that you rely upon the honor of people.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I grant that there is a way of evading this law, but in the case the gentleman speaks of the man will be liable himself to criminal prosecution.

Mr. COOPER. By what law would he be liable?

Mr. KENDALL. Yes; under what law would he be liable?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Under the law which requires a corporation——

Mr. KENDALL. But the gentleman spoke of an individual disbursing this money.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. If a corporation gives you money to contribute, then the corporation violates the law and would be subject to punishment.

Mr. KENDALL. But suppose an individual gives a hundred dollars each to a thousand men, would your law touch that?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. It would not, unless the fact should be known to the committee, in my opinion.

Mr. CULLOP. He is already liable under the law.

Mr. LEWIS. I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri whether his committee considered the advisability of prohibiting the receipt of contributions that had not been published, after the last report?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. We did consider it, and we found that emergencies might exist which would make it highly proper and right for a great committee to collect money within 48 hours of an election, and therefore we omitted any reference to that matter.

Mr. KENDALL. I want to make this rejoinder to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP], that in the case I supposed, of course the candidate would be liable under the laws of his State, but that conduct could not be ventilated before the public in order to affect the election. That is the point I made.

Mr. AUSTIN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question. Did the committee consider the question of limiting the amount of money to be legitimately expended by a candidate?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. No. We considered it; yes; but this bill does not cover it.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman object to an amendment to that effect?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I certainly would, because I think it would destroy the law. I do not believe this Congress has a right to say how much a citizen can contribute for any purpose in his State.

Mr. AUSTIN. I mean a candidate.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Well, a candidate. The State laws ought to govern that. I again repeat, I am opposed to an invasion of the power and jurisdiction of the State.

Mr. AUSTIN. To fix the amount of legitimate expenses, to prohibit a candidate for Congress from exceeding that amount.

Mr. LANGLEY. It might cost more in Tennessee than in Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I think the State ought to regulate that.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman accept an amendment in effect that where the election of a Member of Congress is shown to have been obtained by the corrupt use of money it would be void.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. No; but I will vote with the gentleman to turn such a man out of Congress.

Mr. AUSTIN. Why not put it in this bill?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Because the bill is not drawn for that purpose, and such a provision would be entirely out of harmony with this law.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I was wondering how the gentleman could hold that opinion, in view of the fact that the Constitution says that Congress shall be the judge of the election returns and the qualifications of a Member. Why would it not be proper, in view of that language in the Constitution, to legislate along those lines?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have tried to make myself clear, and if I have failed I fear I will be unable to do so. I do not doubt the power of Congress to thus legislate, but I doubt the wisdom of such legislation. Now, it may be we are all wrong about this, but if it should turn out that we are wrong and abuses grow up which may be remedied, I will go as far as any gentleman on this floor to reach out after those abuses and see if we can not regulate them in the future.

If the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] desires to consume time, I will be glad if he would do so now. However, Mr. Speaker, before yielding the floor, I desire to offer the following amendment and have it pending.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment to the preamble, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 3 to 9, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That sections 5 and 6 of an act entitled 'An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected,' approved June 25, 1910, be and the same are hereby amended to read as follows:"

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. That is a mere change of phraseology in the preamble.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I am glad the gentleman offered that to save me the trouble.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I now reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I certainly favor this measure, but, in my judgment, it does not begin to go far enough. As a matter of fact, it apparently costs the Republican national committee a great deal more money for a congressional campaign than it does the Democratic Party [applause on the Democratic side] for this reason: The Democratic fights in the South are made at the primaries, and that is where the Democrats spend their campaign money. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is it not a fact that the Democrats rely on the people to carry the elections and you do not? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KAHN. Oh.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. Just for a question.

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Is it not a fact that in most of the States where they have primary laws—it is so in Georgia and most of the States in that section—that the States require in primary elections that everyone shall file an account of the expense incurred in that primary election?

Mr. KAHN. That may be so, but the country will look to the report filed in the House of Representatives and will not go to every one of the States to find out what was expended in each one of the different States. Now, this bill was framed for the purpose of giving publicity to campaign expenditures——

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. I only have five minutes.

Mr. HARDY. Just for one question.

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman has said that in the South we spend our money in the primaries. Has there been any money spent in any such primary equal to what Sibley expended in Pennsylvania?

Mr. KAHN. Well, I am not familiar with conditions in the South, but I have heard that your primary contests there are intensely sharp and bitter, and I dare say there is a considerable sum of money spent in many districts in the South at the primaries. Of course when your primary is over you do not have to spend a dollar at the general election. [Applause on the Republican side.] Your contests are decided at your primaries.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman makes a correct statement about the expenditure of money in the primaries in the South, but what I want to ask was if any such amount was expended in a primary in the South as in Sibley's nomination in Pennsylvania?

Mr. KAHN. I suppose Mr. Sibley learned the expenditure of money when he was a Democrat. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I simply want to call to the attention of the House and to the attention of the country the fact that this bill is entirely inadequate, and in order to have a proper publicity bill there should be a clause inserted which would compel the filing of accounts at all primaries, as well as at the general elections, and I would gladly vote for such a feature to be included in the pending bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing more important in a republican government than to have honest and pure elections. The results of legislation and administration have never been and can never be altogether satisfactory if the source of power is corrupted or polluted in any form or manner. I am in favor of all legislation that is calculated to safeguard the integrity of the ballot in the United States and to protect every citizen in the land in the right to vote and in the fearless exercise of that right against the corrupting power of money or any other of the devices and methods that have been employed in years past to prevent fair elections. Every elector ought to have the right to vote, and to have that vote counted the way he casts it. Elections ought to express the mature, free, and honest convictions of the electors in all parts of the Union.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, can accomplish but little along that line. The only improvement it purports to make over the law that was enacted in the last Congress is that it requires reports of funds collected by national committees, congressional and general, before as well as after elections. It makes, as has been remarked, absolutely no provision to protect the purity, the integrity of the institution of the primary in the United States, which is becoming quite general in the States.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will yield.

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman seems to be basing his opposition to this bill on the proposition that it does not include primaries. Did not the Republican national convention, of which you were a member, vote down a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] providing for the publicity of campaign funds before the election?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Why, if the gentleman will give heed, the House of Representatives in the last Congress passed a bill of that kind, and I voted for it.

Mr. JAMES. I am talking about the party nationally.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let me say to the gentleman that he is mistaken when he says I was a member of the last Republican national convention. I was not.

Mr. JAMES. Do not dodge the issue.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not dodge the issue. I voted for a measure requiring reports before as well as after elections. I have done my share toward securing full and complete reports of the funds that have been accumulated and expended, and that may be accumulated and expended by campaign committees.

Mr. JAMES. I am willing to assume that the gentleman is better than his party, but what I wanted to know was the position of the gentleman's party on this question.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman seems to be well advised upon that proposition. He has been giving me some suggestions that had passed entirely from my own mind in relation to it. Now, the suggestion has been made in relation to a report concerning the expense of the primary in a congressional district of the State of Pennsylvania where one of the candidates spent more than $40,000. Some of the States provide for primaries without requiring publicity of the expenditures of candidates. I say that it is just as important in probably four-fifths of the districts of the United States, and probably more important, to have publicity of expenditures used to secure nominations as it is to have publicity of amounts collected and used for the purpose of influencing elections. Reference has been made to a great section of the country where the only real election is at the primaries, and this bill does not have any bearing upon the primary at all, and therefore does not apply to that section of the country.

It does not apply to that section of the country, and yet Representatives there are insisting on and demanding and clamoring for legislation that will make public the moneys that are expended to influence elections, because they are entirely free from its operation.

There is another thing, Mr. Speaker. Special elections occur occasionally, and there may be a vacancy in a congressional district; under conditions in the membership of the House the two parties stand practically equal, and the election might control the politics of the House. And yet this bill makes absolutely no provision in relation to special elections where a single Representative may be elected and where the election might be accomplished by the expenditure of fabulous sums.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I woud like to know if the gentleman can cite any instance in the last 20 years where the national Democratic Party ever took an active part, or any part, in the nomination or primary election of Representatives in Congress, either South, East, or West? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. What difference does it make?

Mr. RAKER. It makes all the difference on earth.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Representatives in Congress are Federal officers. They make laws for all the country. And while we are in the business, why do we not go far enough in our legislation to accomplish something that will be of substantial benefit?

Mr. RAKER. I would like to ask the gentleman: When his side of the House had this bill under consideration, why did not he and his colleagues offer this amendment and incorporate it in the law when he had the opportunity?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It came up before on a motion to suspend the rules and was not amendable. We did incorporate the provisions contained in this bill, but when that bill came back from the other branch of Congress the provision in relation to contributions before, as well as after primaries, was stricken out.

Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote for this bill. It contains a little good. But it seems to me that the great committee that prepared the bill and brought it into the House should have broadened its provisions, should have made it relate to special elections as well as general elections, should have made it relate to primary elections wherever they are required by the laws of any State, and if that had been done I think it would have gone a long step further in purifying elections.

Mr. FARR. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the getleman yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR]?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. FARR. Does the gentleman know, speaking about Pennsylvania, that it was due to an act of the Pennsylvania Legislature relative to expenditures at the primaries that Mr. Sibley's extravagant expenditures were indicated and this resulted in forcing him from the Republican ticket in his district, thus showing the importance of this publicity at the primaries as well as at elections?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand that was the case. That was a Republican measure, and this is a Republican measure, because we passed it through the last House. This is a Republican movement. [Applause on the Republican side.] The Republican Party always has stood in favor of honest elections, always has advocated the principle that every citizen of the country who assists in bearing the burdens of the Government ought to have something to say with respect to the making and enforcement of laws and to the levying of taxes and the expenditure of public money.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague from Indiana?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will, with pleasure.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Is it not a fact that at Gary, Ind., in the election of 1908 several thousand people cast their votes who had never taken out their first naturalization papers?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, if there has been any such situation in the State of Indiana it must have been down along the Ohio River where my colleague resides. Nothing like that happened in the northwestern part of the State in the district that I represent. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. COX of Indiana. Does the gentleman say that condition never occurred in the election of 1908 at Gary, Ind.?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I can say, and say it with absolute truth, that that charge was made in 1908, and a full investigation under the guise of a contest was made by a Democratic organization, and after an exhaustive investigation the proceeding was dismissed; and the men who instituted it have not even paid the costs of the proceeding. We do not vote anybody in northwestern Indiana except those who have the right to vote, but we do allow everybody there to vote who has the right to vote and we see that the votes are counted. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. BUTLER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan a question.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Does the gentleman want some time?

Mr. BUTLER. No; I do not want any time.

Mr. KENDALL. If the gentleman is going to defend the State of Pennsylvania, we want him to do it in a voice loud enough to be heard.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania please speak loud enough for the Chair to hear him?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, Mr. Speaker, it will be a pleasure to make an effort to have the Chair hear me. I should like to ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] a question or two.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Very well. If I can answer them I will be glad to.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman is a member of the committee that reported this bill. I would have asked the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] these questions, but I was afraid I would be unable to make him hear me, the distance being great between us. I understand it is the purpose of this bill to publish, prior to the election, contributions of money made, in the words of the bill "for the purpose of influencing elections". That is true, is it not?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I suppose so.

Mr. BUTLER. Does the gentleman know that while there is a time set for filing these reports, there is no time set for making them up?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. They must be made up before they can be filed.

Mr. BUTLER. That is true. Suppose the treasurer of the national committee or of the congressional committee happens to reside in the city of San Francisco and has to file his report here in Washington, his report must necessarily be made up several days prior to day of filing. I suppose he will file his report or statement here on the day stated in the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The way to avoid that difficulty is to move the Republican headquarters to Washington.

Mr. BUTLER. I have nothing to do with the location of the treasurer. I am only putting a question to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG], whether or not his committee considered the necessity of requiring these reports to be made up on a day certain?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. The gentleman has asked me what the committee did and what consideration they gave to this measure. Yesterday in the House, when the joint resolution amending the Constitution of the United States was under consideration, I stated the circumstances regarding the meeting of the committee; that notices were sent out the evening before and did not reach the Republican members of the committee, except in one instance, until the committee had met and acted. I will now say to the gentleman that in the one hour during which, as I am informed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], the committee was in session it found time from its arduous labors in considering the amendment to the Constitution to report out this bill. I can not tell you just what consideration the committee gave to all these questions. I will say to the gentleman that it is my purpose to vote for this bill——

Mr. BUTLER. So is it mine.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Because I think it is a step in the right direction; but I do believe it would have been wiser if the committee had not reported it so soon, and I believe we could then have had a better bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield to me a minute or two?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I will yield to the gentleman two minutes if he wishes it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I suppose there can be no difference of opinion upon the purpose of this bill. It is to make known to the public in advance contributions of money made for the purpose of influencing elections. It seems to me it might have been made effective. If the committee had included in this bill a provision that there should be no contributions of money made either for general or for primary election purposes I presume I would have voted for such provision, although I doubt whether an election can be conducted, no matter how honestly, without using for legitimate purposes certain sums of money.

But this bill will not furnish the knowledge that the public demands. It does provide for the day when these reports shall be filed, but it does not provide the time when they shall be made up. If they are filed five days before the election, they must be made up prior to that time, of course. Contributions that were intended to be made might be made after the report is made up but before the report is filed, because of the time necessary for its transmission by mail or otherwise.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the other gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BUTLER. If he does not take more than a minute and three-quarters of my time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact that we have a better corrupt-practices act in Pennsylvania than this one, and better calculated to give the public information about these transactions than does this bill?

Mr. BUTLER. I have no doubt the gentleman is correct in his conclusion.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. COOPER. I observed the reply of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to his colleague as to the excellent character of the corrupt-practice act in the State of Pennsylvania. Does that provide for the publication before election?

Mr. BUTLER. It provides for a filing in the office of the prothonotary of the different courts within so many days after the election. Fifteen days, one of my colleagues says.

Mr. COOPER. After the money has been contributed and expended and the men are in office.

Mr. MADDEN. No; it is after the nomination.

Mr. BUTLER. After the nomination.

Mr. COOPER. Is there any provision for the publication before the nomination?

Mr. BUTLER. I have no recollection of it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. it is both after the primaries and after the election.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would like to ask whether the conversation over on that side is a private conversation, or are we supposed to know what is going on?

The SPEAKER. That is not a parliamentary inquiry. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will proceed.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, we have an act in Pennsylvania that requires all of us who are candidates for office to make and return under oath the amount of contributions made to us for political purposes and the amount expended, but that act requires us to make it after the primary and before the general election. But if we had been making an act in the State of Pennsylvania requiring us to publish in advance the moneys contributed for political purposes it would have been made effective. It would have required the report——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman time enough to finish his statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan yields to the gentleman from Pennsylvania all the time the gentleman wants.

Mr. BUTLER. I am obliged to the gentleman from Michigan for the privilege and to the Speaker for stating it. This act seems to be weak in the particulars I have stated. There is opportunity for the contribution to be made after this report has been made up but before filing.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Why can not Congress pass a law making it a felony for anyone to offer to contribute, advance, or loan, or for any committee or any other committee to receive any money within five days prior to the election, or prior to a primary?

Mr. BUTLER. I have no doubt Congress could make such a law; and if it did, that it would meet all the complaints and just complaints that are now made, but this bill makes no such provision.

Mr. COOPER. It could, because we could amend it.

Mr. BUTLER. I am criticizing the bill for the reasons I have stated.

Mr. MANN. If no contributions could be made after five days before election, who would pay the bills of the committee when it was in debt?

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know whether the political philanthropists are all dead or not.

Mr. MANN. They could not contribute if they were not.

Mr. COOPER. Suppose we compelled the committee to live within its income and not to go in debt for corrupt purposes; let it expend what it received.

Mr. MANN. There is no concern on earth that makes no bills until it has the money in the bank. The gentleman from Wisconsin or the gentleman from Pennsylvania or the gentleman from Illinois, none of them can do it, and no political committee can do it.

Mr. BUTLER. I would anticipate that no prudent man, treasurer of a committee, would take the chances of getting contributions after election, especially if his side had been unsuccessful. Mr. Speaker, I do not care for any more time.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KOPP].

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this bill, but in one respect I think it takes a step backward, and a vital one. There is no doubt in my mind but that the people of this country are demanding absolute purity in elections, and when we are drawing an act, we should draw it so as to have it as airtight as possible. Now, when they increase the amount of expenditure from $10 to $100, which the committee is required to report, it is leaving a loophole through which practically all of the funds of a great committee can be expended. I hold in my hand the statement of the receipts and the expenditures of the last national Democratic congressional committee during the last election, and nine-tenths of the items in that report are between $10 and $100. If this bill passes, all of those would be grouped under one head. It seems to me that if these gentlemen on that side, as well as on this side of the House, are desirous of having absolute purity in elections, they should not object to putting that back to $10.

The only argument that has been advanced for increasing the amount from $10 to $100 is that it will save a great amount of bookkeeping. The statement of the Democratic campaign committee covers five or six typewritten pages, and if that is all the bookkeeping that is required, surely the argument fades to nothing. So it seems to me that we ought to adopt an amendment unanimously to make this $10; that no contribution shall be made by any person, firm, or corporation in excess of $10, nor shall the committee expend any amount above $10, without having it accounted for as such. I therefore offer the two amendments, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

On page 3, lines 19 and 20, strike out "one hundred" and insert "ten"; and on page 4, line 3, strike out "one hundred" and insert "ten."

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, this bill may satisfy the majority members of the committee that reported it; but if it is offered in the interests of purer elections, of a purer ballot box, it will not satisfy the American people. It accomplishes nothing that the present law does not accomplish. If Democracy is interested in real reform, let your investigations commence with the primary election and let those investigations continue until after the election in November, and let such investigations be so complete that they will cover all expenditures, whether made by a national committee or made by a candidate himself or by his friends. Let such investigations be most thorough; let them apply to all contributions of which the candidate has any knowledge.

Last fall, when knowledge of the contributions made to the Democratic national congressional committee was published in the newspapers of the country, I was amazed and surprised, as were the people of the State of Iowa, to learn that the man who gave double the amount that any other man gave to the Democratic national committee was Mr. W. C. Beer, of New York.

Who is W. C. Beer? W. C. Beer formerly resided in my State, and while residing there he was known as a poor man. He gave little or nothing in the way of contributions to the Democratic Party in those days, but last fall W. C. Beer made a contribution double the amount of that made by any other Democrat in the United States. That contribution was made the day before election, and at that time W. C. Beer was the confidential man of J. Pierpont Morgan & Co. [Applause on Republican side.]

Mr. BUTLER. Was Mr. Beer ever a Republican?

Mr. GOOD. I do not know. He paid little attention to politics when he lived in the State of Iowa, but his uncle, Judge Reed, was elected to Congress from Iowa as a Republican; but, Mr. Speaker, I do know that when he made this contribution to the Democratic campaign fund he was the confidential man of J. Pierpont Morgan & Co. If you are honest in your attempt to secure publicity——

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Just a minute. If you are honest in your endeavors to obtain publicity of campaign contributions, you should try to ascertain the real source of these contributions. Committees should not be permitted to put in the names of persons as contributors to campaigns when the contribution is in fact made or paid by some one other than the person who is reported as having made the contribution.

Mr. STANLEY. What is Mr. Beer's official relation to J. Pierpont Morgan?

Mr. GOOD. He is the confidential man to J. Pierpont Morgan & Co., and I know of no one closer to J. Pierpont Morgan himself than Mr. W. C. Beer, of New York, who made this enormous contribution.

Mr. STANLEY. Is he the confidential friend of Mr. Morgan or in his employ?

Mr. GOOD. In his employ, I understand.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] that he had better apply for information to the Democratic national congressional committee, which might be better informed.

Mr. STANLEY. Oh, the Democratic national committee is not nearly as close to Mr. Morgan as gentlemen on that side.

Mr. GOOD. The record does not bear out the gentleman's statement.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CLAYTON). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCGUIRE].

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I am for this bill. I am for it because there is some good in it, but there are a great many things that might contribute to the interests and integrity of the American people, the candidates and political committees, that are not in it. I come from a State where the Democratic Party has the governor and has had since we became a State. It has the senate and the house of representatives. Upon their accession to power we had a nonpartisan election law, an election law against which no man had ever raised his voice. Now we have an election law that is a disgrace to civilization and to the human race, passed by a Democratic senate, a Democratic house, and signed by a Democratic governor of the State. I am a little surprised that the Democratic Party will even go this far in their pretense of being in favor of honest elections in this country. Why should not this provide for a publication of contributions in the primaries? I want to relate to you gentlemen a little incident: We have primary elections, and in the last campaign I have every reason to believe the man who ran against me for the nomination spent four times as much as he could spend under the election law——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. May I have a minute more?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I yield the gentleman a minute additional.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan concedes me a minute more. The penalty for having spent more than he may spend under the law is that he can not go upon the ballot. The gentlemen in charge of that State, the State officials, were in favor of his nomination. After he was defeated he never did render an accounting, and he has not today, of the money that he spent in the primary campaign; and hence I say, if you want to be square with the people, if you are what you profess to be, if you want to guarantee honest elections, if you want to make men honest in their campaigns, insert in here a provision that the candidate must account for every dollar and every penny he spends prior to his nomination.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I do.

Mr. JAMES. I understood the gentleman of whom the gentleman from Oklahoma is talking about was a Republican who sought the nomination of your party.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. But he was favored by the Democratic officials of the State.

Mr. JAMES. And you say now he has not made——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I ask for a minute more.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I yield the gentleman one minute.

Mr. JAMES. You say now there is a law in your State that requires he shall make publication of the amount expended?

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Yes; and the penalty is he can not go on the ballot unless he does so.

Mr. JAMES. And you claim that he has not done so?

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. He has not.

Mr. JAMES. Why was he not prosecuted?

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Because we have Democratic officials in our State. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] I have only mentioned, Mr. Speaker, one of the vast number of violations of the law in that State, and you can not get a prosecution.

Mr. JAMES. Does the gentleman charge here on this floor that the laws in your State are such that one Republican can not have another Republican prosecuted for a violation of the law?

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Not by a Democratic governor and Democratic State officials, and that is exactly what I say.

Mr. JAMES. I want to say to the gentleman that I have a better opinion of his State than he gives to it.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. I have a good opinion of the State, but not of the gentlemen who have been in power in that State. [Applause.]

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to amend two sections of a law which we passed in the last Congress. I have no criticism whatever to make of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] or his committee in reporting a bill to the House providing simply for the amendment of these two sections and not including in this report at this time other matters which I think ought to be enacted into law.

The original act provides only for reports of contributions of committees as they are defined in the act, where the committee endeavors to influence the election in two or more States, and hence excludes entirely the matter of contributions either for the election of a Member of Congress to his own committee or for primary elections, because there are no committees in existence which seek to influence, under the terms of the act as it was defined on the floor here, the primaries in two or more States. The amendments which have been inserted are the changes which have been inserted by the bill; in my opinion are desirable changes—in the main, at least. Under the original law, apparently, while the committees were required to furnish the names of persons contributing on the amounts of expenditures of over $10—the names of persons—they were not required to report the amount contributed or expended. That was undoubtedly an inadvertent defect in the law. And the amendment to section 6 of the original act as carried in here is designed to correct that mistake. But, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], presiding over his great committee, will bring into this House a bill in regard to campaign contributions both for the election of individual Members of Congress and for their nomination.

The gentleman stated, as I understood him, that it was not within the power of Congress, but that that was a State matter. What is the distinction between our control over elections of Members of Congress in more than one State and our control over the election of a Member in a district?

If we have the constitutional authority to effect the election of 10 Members of Congress, we have the equal authority to control the election of one Member of Congress. There is no distinction absolutely between our power to require a statement of all expenses in regard to the election of a single Member and our power to require the knowledge in regard to the election of all Members.

I have myself been several times a candidate for Congress. At a recent election the gentleman who ran against me is reported to have spent over $40,000 in endeavoring to accomplish his election. At a primary a few years ago a very fine gentleman ran against me, and was reported to have spent over $40,000 in seeking to be nominated. For myself, I am not able to expend such large sums of money, nor am I willing to accept contributions of such amounts, which would allow me to expend them. And I believe it would be far more desirable and effective if Congress should require a man who is a candidate at the primary and at the election to report all of his contributions and expenses and to limit the amount which he may receive or expend. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Does the gentleman wish any more time?

Mr. MANN. I would like another minute.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Now, I understand perfectly well that in many districts in the country a nomination is equivalent to an election. I have always considered that that was the case in my district, although it was not quite so certain last fall as it had been on previous occasions.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. You get there just the same.

Mr. MANN. There is no reason why we should permit the expenditure of such sums of money for primaries or elections. And I hope the gentleman will take under consideration the right of Congress to control. If there be State laws, let there be in addition a national law. Many men are prone to take chances on the violation of State laws, when their own friends or party friends are in charge of local offices, who would not dare to tamper or challenge the execution of a national law. On both sides of this Chamber, in my opinion, there exists an honest desire that the elections of the country shall be as fair and just as possible, that they should not be affected by corruption, and that they shall not be influenced by the expenditure of great sums of money.

On both sides of the Chamber gentlemen think alike on this question. Why should we not meet with an affirmative response the demand of the country that in these days, when the people believe more now than they ever did before in the effectual control of government by the citizens and believe that their elected officials shall be elected honestly and that they shall have the opportunity to select capable representatives without fear of the influence of money or other corrupt methods? I hope that the House, with the gentleman from Missouri and his party now in responsible control, will not be satisfied with simply crossing a "t" or dotting an "i" on an act which this House passed during the days when the Republicans were in responsible control, but that they will go a step further and add a law, new on the statute books, which we are all prepared to vote for and not feel that they have done their duty simply by bringing into the House a bill which we passed practically as now brought in once before. [Applause.]

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire how much time is remaining to each side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan has 14 minutes remaining. The gentleman from Missouri has 25 minutes remaining.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I ask, then, that the gentleman from Missouri use some of his time.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer one amendment and have it pending for consideration, to be acted upon at the proper time, and if the Clerk will take it down I will read it to him. It is this:

On page 2, line 6, strike out the word "sixth" and insert in lieu thereof the word "third."

The purpose of offering this amendment is to have the last publication occur not more than three days before the election. The object is to provide that there shall not be time intervening between the last publication and the day of election, so that a large "slush fund" may be collected and distributed throughout the country for the purpose of corrupting the voters. For this reform the Democratic Party has been contending for years.

I am somewhat astonished that Members on that side of the House, our Republican friends, say they are in favor, and their party is in favor, of this kind of legislation. I would ask, How long since have they been converted to this reform? In 1908 the Democratic candidate for the Presidency, from the day of his nomination to within 60 days of the election, appealed to the Republican candidate to cooperate with him to make public before the election all the contributions to their respective campaign funds. The Republican candidate refused to do it; his party refused to do it; but within six weeks of the election, for the purpose of meeting an indignant public opinion, the Republican candidate agreed to a publication of the contributions after the election, instead of before, as the Democratic candidate had requested.

I will ask gentlemen on that side of the House, if your party stands for this kind of a reform, why was it that when it was in the control of the Senate last spring it struck out the most beneficial clause of all in the legislation proposing this reform—the publication of contributions to campaign funds before the election, the provision contained in that bill—and amended it so that the publication would be made after the election? If your party stood in favor of this reform, why did it not leave the provision on that subject as it was when it left the House, and as it had been passed by the House here? Why did they strike out the most important feature of the bill if they stood in favor of this reform?

If gentlemen on that side desired to have reformation by legislation in regard to primary elections, last June, when this bill was before the House, and when you were here with a large majority on this floor, why did you not incorporate that provision in the bill as it passed this House then? What since the adjournment of Congress last June has converted you to this great doctrine of reform? Was it the election in November, 1910, whereby you were swept out of power and the Democratic Party in this House put in power? [Applause on the Democratic side.] I believe in the publication before the election, in order that the people may know what interest, if any, is contributing to the campaign funds of any candidate or any party, and that the people may have this knowledge, so they can intelligently cast their votes. It is a step in the right direction, and the bill should be passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield half a minute to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PEPPER].

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I object.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY].

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, the effort of our friends on the other side to convince the country that they ardently desire more rigid legislation to prevent the improper use of money in influencing elections is grotesque and amusing. You know, and I know, and the world knows, that a law preventing the use of money in elections, in order to be effective, must provide for publishing the names of the men who are seeking to control the electorate before the ballots are cast. The sole purpose of legislation of this kind is to notify the voter beforehand that certain influences, backed by enormous amounts of dirty money, are attempting to control the electorate. To make a display of the way the election was bought after the goods are delivered is to lock the door after the horse is gone. When you controlled this House you positively refused to allow the record to be made before the election. More than that, when you met in national convention and it was proposed, while you were in the limelight, to pledge your party to the exposure of campaign contributions, you voted it down with hoots and yells. Now, when we have you tied hand and foot, when you are driven to the wall, with a yea-and-nay vote confronting you, you protest vociferously about your great desire for untainted elections.

Mr. JAMES. In the convention they voted it down by 900 to 84.

Mr. STANLEY. By an overwhelming majority. There was no roll call there. You spoke then from your hearts; you gave vent to your purposes. In that convention you did not say you would expose the men who made campaign contributions, because you feared you might stop the contributions.

We are twitted here with the statement that Morgan's confidential man contributed $1,000 to a Democratic campaign fund. Now, I very much dislike to discuss men, high or low, especially when they are not here to answer for themselves. I would hesitate to engage in mere abuse of Mr. Morgan just as much as the humblest individual in the land.

But when by innuendo you would put in the RECORD that J. Pierpont Morgan and the interests he represents are behind the Democratic Party, then I demand that the whole truth be known. When the most nefarious legislation that was ever enacted was on its passage in the Senate—to allow the use of railroad bonds and the bonds of the United States Steel Corporation to be used as a basis for our currency—Mr. Morgan hung over the railing of the Senate gallery, eagerly approving the words of Nelson A. Aldrich. That was a display of his Democracy. When I attempted to have his darling child, the United States Steel Corporation, investigated, and had a resolution for that purpose before the Rules Committee, who opposed it? Not one Democrat. Who favored it? Not one Republican. Do not "shake your gory locks" at us and tell us because Morgan's confidential man gave a thousand dollars that Morgan or Morgan influences are behind the Democratic Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE].

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee, I apologize for rising again so soon to address the House. I do it under the jibe of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG], who sees fit to criticize the committee for its action. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] has placed this committee under fire before the country, but we have no apologies to offer to the gentleman or to anyone else for our prompt action on these two bills. We point him to the action of the House yesterday, which by an overwhelming vote, with only 15 votes in the negative, favored the election of United States Senators by the people, and these 15 votes were Republicans. We now have a united and unanimous Democracy in favor of this bill.

So far as the hasty action of the committee is concerned, that side of the House, the Republican side, has frequently had it pointed out to them on the floor of this House that unless they ceased to bury legislation in the committee rooms and to make legislation in the committee rooms, that unless they would let it be brought on the floor of the House and acted upon here, they would be driven from this House.

They have been frequently warned on the floor of this House that unless they ceased to increase the expenditures of the people's money they would be driven from this House, yet they went on, and even in the Sixtieth Congress increased new offices and salaries to the extent of $30,000,000. They have been frequently reminded that unless they ceased to place the burden of tariff legislation upon the backs of the people that these burdens would become in time like the burdens of the children of Israel, and that they would be driven from this House. And now, sir, these warnings have been exemplified by the empty Republican seats on the other side of this House. I tell you, sir, we must listen to the demands of the people. And one of these demands is prompt, though prudent, action in the committee rooms. [Applause.] I can not see how any Member of this House can afford to record himself opposing pure election. God speed the day when election corruption funds shall be driven not only from my State, but from every State in the Union. Every corporation or person undertaking to debauch the voter should be swiftly, surely, and severely punished.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Can the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. YOUNG] consume some of his time now?

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL].

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Speaker, I offer a substitute for the pending bill, and ask that the Clerk read it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers a substitute, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That section 5 of the act of June 25, 1910, 'An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected,' shall be amended so as to read as follows:

"'SEC. 5. That the treasurer of every such political committee shall, not more than 15 days and not less than 10 days before an election at which Representatives in Congress are to be elected in two or more States, file in the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives at Washington, D. C., with said Clerk, an itemized detailed statement, sworn to by said treasurer and conforming to the requirements of the following section of this act; and upon every day after the making such statement, and before the day of election, the books and accounts of such committee shall be open to public inspection. It shall also be the duty of said treasurer to file a similar and final statement with said Clerk within 30 days after such election, such final statement also to be sworn to by said treasurer and to conform to the requirements of the following section of this act. The statements so filed with the Clerk of the House shall be preserved by him for 15 months, and shall be a part of the public records of his office, and shall be open to public inspection.'"

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Speaker, one word in explanation of the amendment which I have proposed. It is section 5 of the act as it passed the last House of Representatives, with this addition: That after the preliminary report, made not more than 15 and not less than 10 days before the election, shall have been made, then the books of the committees between the time of making the report and the day of election shall be open to public inspection. There is no reason in the world why contributions as they are received should not be printed in the newspapers when they are received, just as contributions for any public object or for charities are published in newspapers at the time they are received.

It seems to me it is very impracticable to impose on the treasurer the duty of making up a final and definite statement of the receipts and disbursements and swearing to it and filing it in Washington every few days. This gives a starting point of having a preliminary report, and after that the books shall be open to the newspapers, which will have access to them, and they can print the receipts as they are received.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCCALL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman offers this as a substitute for the pending bill?

Mr. MCCALL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The bill contains sections 5 and 6 of the law. The gentleman's proposition only affects section 5.

Mr. MCCALL. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert what was read.

Mr. MANN. But that does not cover section 6.

Mr. MCCALL. It strikes out section 6.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman want to strike out section 6 entirely?

Mr. MCCALL. Yes; because although section 6 is in the bill, I do not think it ought to be in.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, from the discussion here to-day it seems apparent that there may be a greater division on party lines on the pending proposition than there was on the one yesterday. However, Mr. Speaker, I hope that when we come to vote on this measure our Republican brethren will join us in the enactment of this wholesome piece of legislation, and do it with the same practical unanimity that they joined with us yesterday in proposing the joint resolution for the amendment of the Constitution.

I congratulate the Republican Party on the progress that it has made since its last national convention. It has progressed to the extent of joining with the Democrats to secure the passage of a measure requiring the publication of campaign expenses after election. I believe that the majority of the members of that party in this Chamber to-day will join with the Democratic Party in the demand made in the Democratic platform written at Denver in 1908; that the campaign contributions shall be published before election. That is what this measure seeks to do, and I hope the Republicans will progress to the extent of again voting with us.

It comes with bad grace from our Republican brethren here who have been in control of the House 16 years, in control of the Senate and in control of the executive department, to chide us with the failure to bring in a proposition of more far-reaching legislation along the lines than this proposes. They have had uninterrupted control for 16 years. But the fact is, Mr. Speaker, the Republican Party never wanted any reform on this subject. It never espoused any reform in this direction. It never made any efforts in this line seriously until it saw the light which broke with a full force and effect and showed the members of that party the way the American people were thinking and demanding, and the Republicans were convinced in November last. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They saw a great light then, and they now object to this measure, going as far as it does, because it does not go further. We hand it back to you, gentlemen, with suggestion that for 16 years nearly you refused to go at all. Because you say this measure is not perfect, because you say this measure does not go as far as it should, you contend that is an argument against the efforts that we are making here to-day to bring about this reform.

Mr. Speaker, the Democratic Party initiated the movement in the country for the publication of campaign contributions. It was the first party that had the courage to write it in its platform, and a former Member of this House was the first public man outside of official life in the United States to espouse the publication of campaign contributions, Hon. Perry Belmont, of New York, a Democrat. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Speaker, I consider this a rather harmless little bill, and I regret exceedingly that any gentleman on either side of the center aisle in this House should endeavor to treat it as a partisan measure. A measure that proposes to promote purer elections and to throw safeguards around the election of public officials is something to which all parties ought to agree. I think this bill should be so amended as to provide up to what time these statements should be made. The bill provides when the statements shall be filed, or within what time they shall be filed, but it does not name the date or length of time preceding the election down to which all receipts and disbursements shall be shown. I think this is a defect that should be remedied by amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to say in the few minutes that I have that I am not at all satisfied with the scope of this bill or the length to which it goes. I believe that the use of money in primaries and elections is the greatest evil that confronts this Government to-day, and that the greatest danger to our republican institutions is the unrestricted use of money to control primaries and elections. We have had a number of illustrations of this fact in very recent times, and the condition of affairs disclosed in Adams County, Ohio, is not exceptional or one confined to that locality alone. I would, if I had my way, make it a criminal offense for any committee or any person or corporation to send money into a district to influence the election of Members of Congress in that district. Publication of election expenses alone, whether before or after election, is not a sufficient remedy for the evil. I would limit the uses to which money might be expended in any primary or election, and I would make it apply to every congressional district. It is absurd to say that Congress has no control over the election of Members of Congress in any single State or district. The control of Congress, or the right of Congress to control, over such elections is expressly provided for by section 4, Article I, of the Constitution of the United States.

We can, if we will, control all primaries and all elections in every State and in every district of the United States so far as the election of Congressmen is concerned. This bill, to be at all effective, should provide for publication in each district of all moneys contributed or expended by or on behalf of any and every candidate for Congress. The bill as drawn would not affect my district at all. No national congressional committee ever knows that there is such a district. They only send money, if they do send it at all, into the close districts or districts where the use of money may influence the election. Who is it, Mr. Speaker, that contributes money for the election of Members of Congress? No man in my district, no farmer of this country, no small business man, and no laboring man contributes money to influence the election of Congressmen to represent him. It is the great financial interests that hope to benefit by legislation that contribute money to control the election of Members of Congress, and I suppose it is contributed for the reason that an equivalent is expected in return. If I had my way I would prohibit such contributions absolutely and make it a criminal offense. Truly, money is "the root of all evil" and the source of all corruption, and if pure elections is what we desire, the use of money to influence votes should be regarded as one of the greatest crimes, for it is treason to our free institutions. [Applause.] This bill is just one little step in the right direction, and so I shall vote for its passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL].

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by having it strike out all after the enacting clause down to line 23 on page 2 of the bill, so that it would be simply a substitute for the first section.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman will be modified as requested.

There was no objection.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remaining time to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON].

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of offering an amendment to this bill. I am heartily in favor of this bill so far as it goes, and I congratulate the gentlemen on the other side of this House for the promptness with which they have undertaken to legislate upon this subject, which is of great importance and interest to every citizen of the country. But, gentlemen, you have not gone far enough. It is useless to talk about legislating concerning committees which control elections in two or more States and leaving the districts themselves and the candidates themselves in general elections and primary elections absolutely alone; and upon that point I heartily agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]; and therefore it is my purpose to offer here, for the purpose of giving you an opportunity to vote in good faith upon it, the proposition of requiring the candidate himself to file under oath a statement of the amount of money he has received and expended for election purposes. If there is any reason on earth why the Congress of the United States should control the congressional-election committees they should also control the individual who is a candidate for election to the House. This goes to the root of this matter. I now offer this amendment:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That a bill entitled "A bill to amend an act entitled 'An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected,' be amended by the addition of a section to be numbered 6a, which section shall read as follows: 'It shall be the duty of every candidate or Representative in the Congress of the United States, at least 10 days before any general or primary election before which he is a candidate, to file with the Clerk of the House of Representatives at Washington, in the District of Columbia, a full and correct statement of all moneys or things of value received from any source and used by him in any way for the purpose of securing his election, and such statement shall contain a full account of all moneys used by any agent or Representative of said candidate for said purposes when known to the candidate. The said statement shall be verified by the oath of the candidate taken before an officer authorized to administer oaths under the law of the State in which he is a candidate, and shall be sworn to by the candidate in the district in which he is a candidate or Representative in Congress. The several district courts of the United States'"——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman if he would consent to an amendment including the word "Senator," so it would read "any Senator or Representative"?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JACKSON. I will accept that if I have time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The amendment of the gentleman from Kansas is now pending.

The SPEAKER. Yes. The unanimous consent was that any gentleman could offer an amendment in his time. Of course, under the rule you could only have four pending.

Mr. MANN. The reason I made the inquiry was whether the amendment had been read by the Clerk; whether the Clerk had finished reporting the amendment.

The SPEAKER. He had not, and he will conclude the reading of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The several district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction to punish violations of this act and on conviction of any candidate for a violation of this section, or of filing a false statement of such expenses he shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Missouri has six minutes remaining.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to call attention to the fact that this bill fails of its purpose in the fifth section. Under the language of that section, if Members of the House will look to the same, they will note that the treasurers who are required to file reports are not required to file them before any special election, nor would they be required to file them before an election for Members of Congress occurring in the State of Maine, which falls at a different date from that of the election in the other States. These officials are required to file their reports before an election at which Representatives in Congress are to be elected in two or more States. This is not as it should be, for these reports should be filed before every election, not only before a general election, but before an election occurring in States like Maine, and before special elections occurring by virtue of writs issued by the governors of States. In order to meet that situation I send up this amendment, which I ask to have pending at the desk.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On line 2, page 2, after the word "which," insert the words "a Representative," and in line 3 strike out the words "in two or more States."

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, while I was momentarily absent from the Chamber a few moments ago my colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. MCGUIRE] assaulted our State and its citizenship in a way, in my judgment, that is not becoming to a Representative.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I will not have the time to yield. I have only three minutes.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. The gentleman is mistaken about my assaulting the State.

Mr. FERRIS. I can not yield when I have only three minutes.

I have hastily scanned the notes of his remarks, and though they are not corrected, I think they are, as I consulted numerous men on this side of the Chamber, practically correct. But the embarrassment and the sting are lessened somewhat from the fact that the chief malefactor that he assaults was his Republican opponent in the primary.

Now, I will perhaps just have time to say this one thing: If his Republican opponent is guilty of any crime in our State, I think the rest of the delegation from that State, in both branches and of both political parties, will see to it that the court doors are held wide to prosecute any malefactor of justice, whether Republican or Democrat. It seems to me it ill becomes any Member from a State to assault an entire people, assault Republican courts, assault Democratic courts, assault State administration, and assault the whole body politic. Slanders from time to time have fallen from the lips of different political opponents with reference to our State. I do not contend more for my State than for any other, but I do assert here now that the State is full of patriotic and honest people.

Mr. McGUIRE of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. FERRIS. I can not yield in three minutes. I again renew the assertion that the State administration of our State is not more corrupt than those of other States. I again assert that the Republicans and Democrats alike in our State are not more corrupt than in other States. [Applause.] Our State is new, and conditions are new.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] has two minutes remaining.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the House upon the fact that we are now about to give the country another demonstration of Democrats keeping the faith. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am surprised, after finding such unanimity of publicity sentiment on that side of the House, that the great political party which has been in power for 16 years failed during its reign of power to enact a publicity law. I am satisfied that my Republican friends are getting better all the time, and after one or more elections in which we have more publicity our Republican friends will be real good citizens and will thereafter respond to the demands of the people.

I am sorry this law can not go as far as some of the zealous advocates of publicity seem to want to go. I welcome the assistance of my distinguished friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], who to-day advocates publicity before elections, and who so recently, I think within two or three years, has been converted to that faith. I know the gentleman is in good faith and an earnest advocate of publicity. Mr. Speaker, let me say that some suggestions have been made here which, I think, will improve the bill. Some amendments have been proposed to which I shall offer no objection. One of them, at least, is offered in good faith for the improvement of the bill. I will vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KOPP] to strike out "one hundred" and insert "ten" in two paragraphs of the bill. [Applause.] You can not give too much publicity for Democrats. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We will go as far as any Republican in giving real publicity to campaign contributions and expenditures.

Mr. Speaker, in concluding, let me say that this scene to-day has revived in my memory another couplet of poetry:

When the devil is sick, the devil a monk would be;
When the devil is well, a devil of a monk is he.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the Chair to the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment first.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 16, strike out the word "the" and insert the word "said"; and in line 19, add "s" to the word "statement."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the other amendments in the order in which they come.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. RUCKER of Missouri:
Strike out lines 3 to 9, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:
"That sections 5 and 6 of an act entitled 'An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected,' approved June 25, 1910, be, and the same are hereby, amended to read as follows:"

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. I notice in reading the amendment that the Clerk read "June the twenty-fifth."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read that part of the amendment again.

The Clerk read as follows:

June 25, 1910.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. KOPP:
On page 3, lines 19 and 20, strike out "one hundred" and insert "ten."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. KOPP:
On page 4, line 3, strike out "one hundred" and insert "ten."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. CULLOP:
On page 2, line 6, strike out the word "sixth" and insert the word "third."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 145, noes 0.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. MCCALL:
Strike out all after the enacting clause down to and including line 22, on page 2, and insert the following:
"That section 5 of the act of June 25, 1910, 'An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected,' shall be amended so as to read as follows:
"'SEC. 5. That the treasurer of every such political committee shall, not more than 15 days and not less than 10 days before an election at which Representatives in Congress are to be elected in two or more States, file in the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives at Washington, D. C., with said Clerk, an itemized detailed statement, sworn to by said treasurer and conforming to the requirements of the following section of this act; and upon every day after the making of such statement and before the day of election the books and accounts of such committee shall be open to public inspection. It shall also be the duty of said treasurer to file a similar and final statement with said Clerk within 30 days after such election, such final statement also to be sworn to by said treasurer and to conform to the requirements of the following section of this act. The statements so filed with the Clerk of the House shall be preserved by him for 15 months, and shall be a part of the public records of his office, and shall be open to public inspection.'"

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] may be allowed to correct his amendment so as to leave the bill as already amended down to and including section 9, and make his amendment apply only to what comes after the words "section 5" down to section 6.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, I assent to that.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

So that the amendment will read: "Strike out of the bill all after the words 'section 5,' in line 10, on page 1, down to and including line 20, on page 2, and insert the following."

Mr. MANN. That is correct.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts——

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, which is to strike out the portion of the bill named and insert the amendment that has been read by the Clerk.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 65, noes 101.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask for another reading of the amendment.

Mr. JAMES. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the roll call. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 111, nays 196, answered "present" 2, not voting 79, as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the next amendment, offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. JACKSON].

The Clerk read as follows:

That a bill to amend an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected" be amended by the addition of a section to be numbered 6a, which section shall read as follows: "It shall be the duty of every candidate or Representative in the Congress of the United States, at least 10 days before any general or primary election before which he is a candidate, to file with the Clerk of the House of Representatives at Washington, in the District of Columbia, a full and correct statement of all moneys or things of value received from any source and used by him in any way for the purpose of securing his election, and such statement shall contain a full account of all moneys used by any agent or representative at large of said candidate for said purposes when known to the candidate. The said statement shall be verified by the oath of the candidate, taken before an officer authorized to administer oaths under the law of the State in which he is a candidate, and shall be sworn to by the candidate in the district in which he is a candidate or Representative in Congress.

"The several district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction to punish violations of this act, and on conviction of any candidate for a violation of this section or of filing a false statement of such expenses, he shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were 106 ayes and 140 noes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays, and, pending that, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be again reported by the reading clerk now at the desk so that Members can understand what it is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent, pending his demand for the yeas and nays, that the amendment may be again reported by the Clerk.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the demand of the gentleman from Illinois for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 172, nays 131, answered "present" 2, not voting 83, as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. LEE of Pennsylvania with Mr. RODENBERG.

Mr. JAMES with Mr. MCCALL.

Until further notice:

Mr. GOULD with Mr. CAMPBELL.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY with Mr. PAYNE.

Mr. PATTEN of New York with Mr. SLEMP.

Mr. FIELD with Mr. PARRAN.

Mr. WHITE with Mr. TILSON.

Mr. WILSON of New York with Mr. MITCHELL.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the first part of the amendment which has just been agreed to is not in proper form, and I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to the amendment in order that it may be perfected, to give it the proper caption.

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been ordered, the gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to perfect the amendment as follows. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the first five lines and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. That a new section be added to said act at the end thereof, to be known as section 11, as follows: Section 11."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, that is simply to put the proper caption to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On line 2, page 2, after the word "which," insert the words "a Representative or"; in line 3 strike out the words "in two or more States."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 6, noes 90.

So the amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended bill.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Is it proper at this stage of the proceedings to move to recommit with instructions?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The question was taken, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask what the number of the section is that was put on the bill a few moments ago?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to answer the gentleman, I will state that it will be section 2 of the bill and section 11 of the law.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit this bill to the Committee on the Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress, with instructions to report the bill back forthwith with section 2 of the bill stricken out.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the gentleman who makes the motion opposed to the bill?

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. As it is now, yes; and so is every other man who wants publicity.

Mr. MANN. Well, we are willing to vote for the bill. Let the gentleman vote against it on the final roll call. That is the test.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I did not say I would vote against it on the final roll call.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not debatable. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri to recommit this bill to the Committee on the Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress to report the same back forthwith with section 2 of the bill stricken out.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 155, noes 136.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 157, nays 149, answered "present" 2, not voting 81, as follows:

So the motion to recommit the bill with instructions was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. ELLERBE with Mr. GRIEST.

Mr. Moss of Indiana with Mr. CAMPBELL.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a recapitulation of the vote.

The SPEAKER. It is not proper to ask for a recapitulation until the vote is announced.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the demand for a recapitulation.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, in compliance with the instructions of the House of Representatives, I report back from the Committee on Election of the President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress the bill H. R. 2958, amended by striking out section 2 in accordance with the direction of the House, and upon that bill and amendment I move the previous question to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reports back from the Committee on the Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress the bill H. R. 2958, with an amendment striking out section 2, and on that and the passage of the bill he demands the previous question.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. I take it it is necessary in any event to order a reengrossment of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is it in order to ask for a separate vote on the amendment?

The SPEAKER. Why, a vote would be had on the amendment, of course. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the amendment reported by the gentleman from Missouri from his committee.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri and Mr. HOUSTON demanded a division.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BORLAND. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire whether the gentleman from Missouri——

Mr. FERRIS. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. There is already one pending.

Mr. BORLAND. Just a moment. The parliamentary inquiry is this: The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] has reported a bill from his committee without any amendment on it. There is no amendment to vote on.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BORLAND. The bill has been reported with the section stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The amendment that the gentleman from Missouri reported is to strike out section 2 of this bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the amendment reported from the Clerk's desk. It has not been reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. GARRETT. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent that the amendment be reported?

Mr. MANN. I did not ask unanimous consent. I asked it as a matter of right.

Mr. ADAIR. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out section 2, which reads as follows:

"SEC. 2. That a new section be added to said act at the end thereof, to be known as section 11, as follows:

"SEC. 11. It shall be the duty of every candidate for Representative in Congress of the United States, at least 10 days before any general or primary election before which he is a candidate, to file with the Clerk of the House of Representatives at Washington, in the District of Columbia, a full and correct statement of all moneys or things of value received from any source and used by him in any way for the purpose of securing his election, and said statement shall contain a true account of all moneys used by any agent or representative of said candidate for said purposes when known to the candidate. The said statement shall be verified by the oath of the candidate, taken before an officer authorized to administer oaths under the law of the State in which he is a candidate, and shall be sworn to by the candidate in the district in which he is a candidate for Representative in Congress.

"The several district courts of the United States shall have jurisdiction to punish violations of this act, and upon conviction of any candidate for the violation of this section or of filing a false statement of such expenses, he shall be punished by a fine of not less than $1,000."

The SPEAKER. The real thing to be voted on is striking that amendment out. When the names of Members are called those in favor of striking it out will say "aye" and those opposed will say "no," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 165, nays 139, answered "present" 2, not voting 83, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and he voted in the affirmative.

So the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following additional pair:

On this vote:

Mr. BRANTLEY with Mr. HIGGINS.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The announcement of the result was received with applause.

On motion of Mr. RUCKER of Missouri, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House without leaving copies papers in the following cases, no adverse report having been made thereon:

At the request of Mr. RUCKER of Colorado, the papers in the case of Jeanie G. Lyles (61st Cong.).

At the request of Mr. LA FOLLETTE, the papers in the case of John P. Fitzgerald (H. R. 23132, 61st Cong., 2d sess.).

At the request of Mr. COVINGTON, the papers in the cases of William Lockart (61st Cong.); E. Strimel (61st Cong.); and Oscar Ernst (61st Cong.).

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes; and pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that the time be equally divided between the two sides, one half of the time to be controlled by myself and the other half by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] in general debate.

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And I will state that I intend to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] five hours of my time for him to yield to gentlemen on his side of the House who are in favor of the bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. Is it understood that there will be three days' general debate?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Two or three days.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman include that in his motion—the three days?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; I do not ask for any limitation of time.

Mr. CLAYTON. I simply wanted the information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House bill 4412, generally known as the reciprocity bill, and pending that he asks unanimous consent that the time be controlled, one-half by him and one-half by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], the gentleman from Alabama yielding five hours——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not include that in the request.

Mr. JAMES. I should like to suggest to the gentleman from Alabama if he yields five hours to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] and reserves a like time to himself, and the opposition are to have 10 hours, that would mean 20 hours of general debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If it takes that length of time, we will continue the debate, and I have no desire to cut off debate unduly; but I should like to finish the general debate in three days, if we can do it.

Mr. BURLESON. Or even in a shorter time.

Mr. CLAYTON. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] is in accord with the gentleman from Alabama on this proposition?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I said that I would yield time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], to yield to gentlemen on that side who are in favor of the bill.

Mr. DICKINSON. Out of your time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Out of my time.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. DALZELL. I simply want to say to the gentleman from Alabama that there is no desire on this side of the House, or upon the part of those whom I represent, to protract the debate unduly. I do not believe we will have any trouble at all in agreeing upon a time to close the debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Of course we want to conclude the debate on this bill at as early a date as practicable. There is no disposition not to give the Members who really want to debate the bill a fair opportunity to do so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. SHERLEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4412, the reciprocity bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that leave be given to each and all gentlemen who have addressed the House to-day on the publicity bill to extend remarks in the RECORD on that subject for five legislative days.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, April 15, 1911, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of Willamette River from Oregon City to Eugene, Oreg. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 15, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, whose love fills all space with rays divine, we hallow Thy name for that greatest of all events which demonstrates the power of life over death and which will be celebrated on the morrow with prayers of gratitude and anthems of praise throughout all Christendom; make us worthy we beseech Thee of such love and power. May our spiritual eyes be opened that we may penetrate the veil and behold our loved ones on the golden shore with outstretched arms to receive us.

So long Thy power has blest us, sure it still Will lead us on
O'er moor and fen, o'er crag and torrent, till
The night is gone.
And with the morn those angel faces smile,
Which we have loved long since, and lost awhile.

And when the tongue is eloquent no more
The soul shall speak in tears of gratitude.

Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. PLUMLEY, a Representative from the second district of Vermont, appeared at the bar and took the oath of office.

RECIPROCITY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4412, generally known as the reciprocity bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Inasmuch as the House is to resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for a long, extensive, and important debate, I wish to inquire of the Speaker if the Committee of the Whole has any power to grant leave to print or to extend remarks in the RECORD?

The SPEAKER. It has not except to the individual. That has been the uniform practice since I have been here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Kansas, that if there is a desire on that side to have leave to print, I will ask unanimous consent at this time for all gentlemen who speak on the bill to have that right.

Mr. MURDOCK. There is no such desire on this side; there is a desire to curtail it, and I suggest that the gentleman include in his motion a provision that any request in Committee of the Whole for the right to extend remarks, or to print remarks, be referred back to the House and not granted in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state that that motion would not be in order. The right of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is governed by the rules of the House, and my motion could not infringe on those rules. These rules clearly provide that the committee can not grant general leave to print, but that it can grant the right to extend remarks.

Mr. GARRETT. Any one Member can defeat it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is true.

The SPEAKER. All this debate is by unanimous consent.

Mr. MURDOCK. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to ask the gentleman from Alabama a question.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. The regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan demands the regular order. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. SHERLEY in the chair.

Mr. SHERLEY took the chair amid general applause.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4412, the Canadian reciprocity bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that I do not intend to make the opening speech on this bill myself, but expect to close the debate. I yield one hour to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, in opening the debate on the pending measure, I shall ask permission at the outset to acknowledge in behalf of the Democracy of the House our thanks and gratitude to the President of the United States for giving us, in this call for an extra session, the opportunity to quicken the fulfillment of our pledges made to the people. [Applause on Democratic side.] How well and how faithfully we have embraced the opportunity thus far the proceedings of this House during the last 10 days attest. I wish, too, to congratulate the Democracy upon its prompt response to the people's will and the quick redemption of its promises.

Believing that the powers vested in and exercised by former Speakers were subversive of the rights of representative government, we pledged the people that if we were given control of the House we would write into its rules that the one-man power should be destroyed, that the Speaker, whoever he might be, should no longer have the power to appoint committees, to pack committees, so that such legislation as the one man, the Speaker, might will should be kept in or brought out. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We have faithfully kept that pledge. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Believing that, in the administration of the affairs of this House, there was wasteful extravagance of the people's money, that there had been useless offices created by the Republican Party and filled as political jobs, we pledged the people that, if we were given control, we would effect economy and abolish every political job in and around this Capitol. We have redeemed that pledge. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We have not only abolished numbers of useless political offices and obsolete committees, but in the current expenses of the House we have effected an economy of 25 per cent, an annual saving to the people and to the Federal Treasury of more than $180,000. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This, sir, is an earnest of that honest and economical administration which our party would give the country if intrusted with the control of all the departments of the Government.

Believing that the Senate of the United States, and its past several years' record amply justified the belief, was responsive neither to the will nor to the rights of the people, we pledged that, so far as we should be given the power, we would submit to the legislatures of the several States an amendment to the Constitution whereby the Senators should be elected by a direct vote of the people. We have fully and faithfully kept that pledge. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Believing that the American electorate had the right to know before the casting of its ballot to whom each political party was indebted for its campaign funds, we pledged the people that if we were given the power we would enact a law making it compulsory for contributions and the names of contributors and the disbursements to be made public before as well as after the election. That promise has been redeemed. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MADDEN. Before the election or before the nominations? [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Under the Republican statute the honest electorate found out only after it had voted who had bought the election. Under the Democratic bill we provide that the electorate before it cast its ballot shall know who is attempting to purchase the election. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, we promised the people that if we were given the power, so far as our jurisdiction extended, instead of violating the pledges, as has been done by our opponents, we would give to the people an honest revision of the tariff downward, and to-day we take the first step in the consummation of that pledge. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Never in the history of the American Congress, either in the term of a Congress or of an administration, has any party effected for the rights and interest of the people so much beneficent legislation and redeemed so many pledges as has the Democracy of this House within the short period of the last 14 days. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If the House did nothing else during this term, I could take its accomplishments and reforms made within these few days and match them against all the achievements of the Republican Party for the last decade. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am willing to put on one end of the scale our achievements and redemptions of pledges in the House in the last 14 days and on the other end the achievements and redemptions of the Republican Party for the last 14 years, and then appeal to the intelligence, patriotism, and sense of justice of the American people to decide the preponderance. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The administration of President Taft will stand out to the future in unique solitude. It is the first in the history of the Government that has been forced, in the exercise of the power given the President by the Constitution, to convene on extraordinary occasions two sessions of Congress in one term. It is the first time in our history that a President has felt the necessity of calling an extra session when the popular branch of the Government was in the hands of an adverse party. This, fellow Democrats, is a most splendid tribute from a Republican President to the patriotism and wisdom of the Democracy of this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let it be remembered that no Democrat is in the least responsible for this extra session, but that the sole responsibility for its necessity rests upon the members of the President's party in this Capitol.

The Constitution declares that only on extraordinary occasions shall the President convene Congress. The President first exercised this power when, sir, he was but a few days from his oath of inauguration. He felt, he knew, that as the result of 12 years of Republican legislation, the exact age of the Dingley tariff, the condition both of the people and of the Treasury was so distressing that he was compelled to call Congress together to repeal the most important and the most iniquitous law of 12 years of Republican control. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And now, when the work of that session, called to undo former Republican legislation, has been on the statute books less than 2 years, he feels that its resulting conditions, confronting both the people and the administration, are so grave and so extraordinary that it is necessary to call together a Democratic House and a Republican Senate in order to undo the legislation of that extra session. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The first extra session was to repeal the Dingley iniquity; this extra session is to modify and repeal, so far as the President dares to do it in order to hold his face with Republican leaders, the Payne-Aldrich iniquity. [Applause on the Democratic side.] For 10 years I have been accustomed to hear, both from the other side of the aisle and from the White House, and always with a sense of the ridiculous, much talk and rant about Republican capacity for constructive statesmanship. Do you hear anything about that nowadays, gentleman? [Laughter.] Why, my friends, if any Republican in this presence would display the audacity of referring to Republican constructive statesmanship now, in the light of the last two years, every Republican in the House would bow his head in humiliation and mortification. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You and I may differ in our opinion as to your capacity for legislative construction, but one thing is certain, your President believes that every important act you have done requires destruction. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He called your first session together to destroy the only act upon which you claimed the right to control the Government; and he calls this session and begs us Democrats to help him destroy what you did in that session. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And, my friends, we are going to do it the best we can. [Laughter.] I have heard so long and so often on that side for the last 10 years praises for the occupant of the White House that it sounds neither good nor grateful to hear Republicans now denouncing the great dispenser of public patronage. Two years only of their President's administration, and not a Republican leader on that side dares to stand and speak one commending word for their President. On the contrary, the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and my friend from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] and the majority of the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee in the last session, both in their report and on the floor, denounced their own President for turning traitor to Republican policies and principles and indorsing Democratic policies and principles. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I read in the report on the reciprocity measure of the Republican majority on that committee in the last Congress, signed by Mr. DALZELL, Mr. FORDNEY, and others, which no doubt will be adopted as the minority report at this session, a denunciation of the pending measure as "an abandonment of the policy of protection"; and they give that as a reason why a Republican majority in the last Congress voted against and why a Republican majority in this Congress will vote against the bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You Republicans denounce your President for his betrayal of Republican principles; we Democrats commend him for his conversion to Democratic policies. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The standpatters say this bill is a blow at Republican protection. For that reason they oppose it. For that reason I advocate it. For the same reason every loyal, patriotic Democrat in and outside of this House ought to favor it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I want to say to my Democratic colleagues that if there was no other reason that presented itself to my judgment to advocate and vote for this reciprocity measure, this report, written by the high chief priest of protection, the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], would furnish the strongest reason why I, as a Democrat, should favor and advocate it. It is a blow at Republican protection. Though this blow is a weak one, I will never raise my hand to stay it, especially since the strength of our arguments has so appealed to the judgment of a Republican President that he stands with uplifted arm to make the assault. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Strike, Mr. President, strike! Although I have not an overflowing love for or an overabundant confidence in a Republican administration, I will not abandon our cause because its righteousness has almost converted even a Republican President to our theory of the tariff. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Gentlemen, politics is a great humbler of a man's pride; it excepts not that of a President. Let me present to the House Mr. Taft before and Mr. Taft after the election. Let us see what the President before the election thought and said of us, who are now earnestly, faithfully, and patriotically cooperating with him to enact into law the pending measure. I hold in my hand the Republican textbook used in the campaign of 1910. In the attempt to persuade enough of the voters in this country to return here a Republican instead of a Democratic House, these words of Mr. Taft are carried in large black letters, so that whoever should glance at this book could not fail to see his opinion of my fellow Democrats:

> The difficulty with the Democratic Party, and the reasons why the American people thus far have manifested their distrust of it, is because it has no policy which the country can depend upon.

And yet in less than six months he is beseeching us, in order to win back public favor to a repudiated administration, to help him put upon the statute books a Democratic policy. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let us read further:

> Its whole stock in trade is that of irresponsible criticism and obstruction, but when charged with responsibility for doing anything it utterly fails.

Oh, my friends, how the vicissitudes of American politics humiliate the pride of even a President. Irresponsible obstructionists! Utter failures! And yet before that libel upon a great and historic political organization, numbering within its embrace over 7,000,000 voters, becomes cold upon his lips, the desperate necessities of a discredited administration send this President to bended knees, begging before this Democratic majority. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] Instead of that daring and dashing defiance and cruel slander of the Democratic Party, he comes with outstretched hands and sobbing voice, cooing, loving, beseeching us to save his administration from certain oblivion by voting into law this reciprocity agreement. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Whatever be our prejudices, we must commend his political judgment and wisdom. He finds himself and his administration in distressing straits. He must propose something to check increasing public disfavor. Ransacking in vain the history and record of his own party, he turns to that of our party, and in the hope to regain the people's confidence he resorts to a Democratic policy and presents it to the consideration of the Congress and the people as an administration measure. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This measure is Democratic. We are twitted by the standpat Republicans in the House, in the cloakroom, in the committee room, and in the press with the taunt that we Democrats are standing by a Republican President. My friends, that talk does not interfere with me. We do sometimes stand by a Republican President and you sometimes stand by a Republican President. The difference is this: We Democrats stand by a Republican President only when he is right, while you Republicans stand by a Republican President only when he is wrong. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I regret that we are going to have a few patriotic, loyal Democrats on this side who feel it to be their duty to vote against the pending measure. They tell me that one of the reasons why they can not reconcile it with their consciences is because it is a Republican measure—a Republican President's measure. I want to say to those sensitive Democrats who are so prejudiced and who so hate anything coming from a Republican source, now, at this session, that if they had been equally as prejudiced and equally as sensitive as to the source from which measures came at the last extra session the Democrats would have written, with the aid of a few Republican votes, into the statute books a specific demand of the Democratic platform. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] And now these sensitive Democrats, here and elsewhere in the Capitol, are so prejudiced against its source that they will vote against the pending bill. Yet they could, during the last extra session, leave the Democratic side and abandon the Democratic platform and join hands and lock shoulders with my friend DALZELL and my friends PAYNE and Aldrich, and other standpat Republicans, and defeat the redemption of a plain Democratic pledge. [Loud applause.]

Oh, my friends, you can not fool the people at home by saying that this is a Republican measure. Who knows whether it is a Republican measure or not, and who says so? Standpat Republicans are denouncing the President because he favors it, declaring it to be a Democratic measure.

The Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee of the last House and more than 95 per cent of the Democratic Members of that House declared it Democratic and favored it and went on record for it. All but one of the 14 Democratic members of the present Ways and Means Committee, from which comes this bill, and more than 95 per cent of the Democratic Members of this House declare it to be Democratic and will vote for it. A majority of the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee of the last House and a majority of the Republican Members of that House denounced it as Democratic and un-Republican and opposed it. A majority of the Republicans of the present House declare it to be Democratic and un-Republican and will vote against it. Read the record vote of the last session. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Gaines], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the four high priests of the stand-pat protection synagogue, and a majority of their fellow Republicans against it. The present Democratic Speaker [Mr. CLARK] favors it and declares it to be Democratic. The Republican ex-Speaker [Mr. CANNON] opposes it and denounces it as Democratic and un-Republican. And yet some of my sensitive and partisan Democratic friends, here and elsewhere, are unwilling to support it on the ground that it is Republican and un-Democratic, but at the same time are willing to abandon their Democratic comrades, as the battle wages, and join the ranks of the majority of the Republicans, and, side by side with Mr. CANNON and Mr. DALZELL, try to shoot to pieces the flag we are bearing. And they will go back to an honest, intelligent Democratic constituency and say to them, as they say to us, "I can not stomach this measure because it is a Republican measure." [Laughter.] Oh, gentlemen, that is thinner than moonshine. [Laughter.] You have got to get some other excuse.

Now, I say that my friend DALZELL, in talking about the tariff, for once in his life told a plain political truth when he said that this is a Democratic and not a Republican measure. [Laughter.] Why, gentlemen, freer trade relations with Canada, reciprocity with Canada, has been the Democratic policy for 50 years. Mr. DALZELL is right when he says it is un-Republican. Canada is the one excepted country with which the Republican Party for the last 50 years has always refused to make a reciprocal arrangement. In the debates in the Senate in 1890 and 1892 Mr. FRYE, Mr. Hale, and other Senators said that, while the Republican Party was willing to make agreements for reciprocal trade relations with other countries of the Western Hemisphere, they must except Canada. The Democrats declared then that the one country of all countries with which we should have a reciprocal trade agreement was Canada. John Sherman offered an amendment to the McKinley bill including Canada specifically, and, as I recall, only two Republican Senators favored it—Sherman and Plumb.

It is not a Republican measure; it is not a Republican policy. It is a Democratic measure; it is a Democratic policy. Why, away back in 1848 Robert J. Walker, the great tariff-reform Democrat of that generation, the author of the famous Walker tariff bill of 1846, in his annual report urged upon Congress the wisdom, the benefit, and the necessity of this country making a reciprocity agreement with Canada. In 1854 a Democratic administration, a Democratic Congress enacted into law a trade agreement with Canada known as the Canadian trade treaty. It was substantially similar to the present measure, the main difference being that this provides for reduction of the tariff on a greater number of manufactured articles. It appealed so strongly to the judgment and conscience of all parties in the Senate and in the House that there was neither debate nor division against it. The Republicans in January, 1865, passed an act giving a year's notice, as required, of the termination of the reciprocity agreement. It terminated in 1866.

My friends, since I have opened this debate I have not had the advantage at this session of the argument of the most resourceful and the best debater on the Republican side, my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], but I take it that every argument he can now make against this bill, every reason he can now give why one should vote against it, was given in a most carefully prepared and apparently a most carefully studied speech made in February last. I want to say to the gentleman that I know he did not intentionally mislead the House in that speech. I know that he did not intentionally misquote any of the facts or any of the statistics in regard to the effect and result of the former reciprocal agreement with Canada. He declared to this House, and it stands in the RECORD, that the results of that agreement with Canada were so disastrous to the United States that Congress repealed it in 1865, and to substantiate his statement of the great disaster which it wrought to the people he declared that our exports to Canada dwindled from $20,800,000 the year the reciprocity began to $15,200,000 at the expiration of the 12 years of the treaty, while Canada's exports to us increased from $12,000,000 to $46,000,000 during the same time; that when it began the balance of trade in our favor was $8,000,000 annually, but that during the treaty this had been wiped out and at its expiration the annual balance against us and in favor of Canada was $28,000,000 or $30,000,000. He quoted statistics, gotten from somewhere, sustaining him. He contended that our export trade with Canada was practically destroyed, while Canada's export trade to us was enormously increased.

Mr. Chairman, I know my friend was too busy with other things; he was too much occupied with the lamentations over the results of the last election [laughter] to give sufficient time to substantiate these figures; that the person who did the work of gathering up these statistics for him imposed very seriously upon his statistical credulity. What are the facts? Taking the four years immediately preceding the treaty, our total exports to Canada were only $43,000,000; but in the four years immediately succeeding the treaty our exports were over $104,000,000. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And yet a Representative of 250,000 intelligent, honest, and patriotic people stands here in this House, and in order to obtain a party advantage, in order to defeat a Democratic measure, emanating from a Republican President, tells his colleagues and the country that our exports to Canada decreased from $20,800,000 in the 12 years that followed the treaty down to $15,200,000.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. DALZELL. I want to say to the gentleman that the figures I quoted and that are in my speech are not my figures——

Mr. KITCHIN. I knew they were not. [Laughter.] That is what I said.

Mr. DALZELL. They are the figures of the deceased Senator Morrill, of Vermont. They were given by the Senator on the floor of the Senate; and, as I think, the gentleman will find, if he takes the statistics furnished by the Bureau of Statistics, they are borne out by the official statistics.

Mr. KITCHIN. I knew, Mr. Chairman, that with the sensitiveness of the American people now for truth and right, no man, though it be my friend from Pennsylvania, would admit the authorship of such fallacious and misleading figures. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He goes to the tomb and attributes these statistical fallacies to an honored man who has been in his grave for more than a decade. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If Mr. Morrill gave the figures that the gentleman quoted here to this House and incorporated in his speech, then Mr. Morrill was imposed upon by some greedy protectionist and monopolist as badly as the gentleman from Pennsylvania was. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Why did the gentleman select only 1 year out of the 12 years of the treaty to show our imports from Canada? And why the year 1866, the year following the close of the Civil War? An investigation would have shown him that our imports in that year from all nations amounted to about $100,000,000 more than in any previous year. He dared not give the House and the country another one of the 12 years while the treaty was in force. Why did he not produce the statistics of our trade with Canada for the years between the making of the treaty and the breaking out of the Civil War and compare them with the same number of years before the treaty? Let me say here that, even while that great war was raging and the fate of the Union was in the balance, with the energies and industries of our people halted and paralyzed, our exports to Canada were more than her exports to us. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Let me give the House some accurate statistics compiled by the Department of Commerce and Labor. For the four years immediately preceding the treaty our exports to Canada were $43,948,288, and for the four years immediately succeeding they were $104,510,165. Our balance of trade for the four preceding years was $21,492,000, while for the four succeeding years it amounted to $30,221,000. I remind the gentleman, too, that the total trade between Canada and the United States for the four years immediately preceding amounted to only $66,400,000, and for the four years immediately succeeding to $178,798,000. Our exports to Canada for the 12 years immediately preceding the treaty of 1854 were less than $120,000,000. For the 12 years succeeding, the 12 years of its existence, they amounted to over $300,000,000—nearly three times as much. The total trade between Canada and the United States for the 12 years preceding the treaty was less than $160,000,000, but for the 12 years during its existence it was more than $550,000,000, and a balance of trade for every term of 2, 3, 4, 6, or 12 years was in favor of American production and American manufacture. [Applause.]

My friends, the same influences that are fighting this measure now forced then a Republican Congress to terminate that treaty, not in the interest of American trade, not in the interest of international right or justice, but in the interest of protection and monopolistic greed. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If this reciprocity measure fails to pass, either in this House or at the other end of the Capitol, its defeat will be inspired and caused by the same powerful and avaricious interests. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

My friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] declared in his speech that this reciprocity was against the farmer and in the interest of the protected manufacturers. Oh, my friends, contemplate the phenomenal spectacle of the Hon. JOHN DALZELL opposing any tariff measure that is in the interest of the protected manufacturers! [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] I have got as much credulity as any man in this world, and just as much confidence in my friend from Pennsylvania as any other man has, I reckon [laughter], but to save my life I would strain my credulity to the breaking point if I believed he would oppose any measure that would be of advantage to the American manufacturers, when Pittsburg, his home city, is the very citadel of protection. [Laughter and applause.]

And be it remembered that while he loves the farmer mighty good, each and every one of the manufactured articles which this bill reduces or puts on the free list is made in the city of Pittsburg, the home of the distinguished gentleman who now so loves the farmer. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Barbed wire, tin plates, galvanized iron or steel wire, and so forth, are put on the free list. They are made in Pittsburg, the home of my friend Mr. DALZELL. The tariff on portable and traction engines, farming implements, knives and forks, cutlery, and so forth, are reduced. They are made in Pittsburg, the home of my friend Mr. DALZELL. And now he comes and opposes this measure because it is going to hurt the American farmer. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Well, well; did you ever in all your life, gentlemen? [Laughter.]

Let us see how this reciprocity measure is going to injure the farmer from the standpoint of the gentleman and of Pittsburg. The tariff on farm wagons is reduced from 35 per cent to 22 per cent; on feed crushers, field rollers, manure spreaders, from 45 per cent to 20 per cent; on cutlery, from over 70 per cent to 27½ per cent; on table knives and forks, scissors and shears, from over 50 per cent to 27½ per cent; barbed wire and other wire for fencing go to the free list. If this bill passes, the farmer may get his wire fencing a little cheaper; his wagons and other farming implements a little cheaper; his cutlery, his knives and forks, a little cheaper; his salt, his lumber, and many other articles he must have a little cheaper; and Pittsburg manufacturers may have to sell these articles a little cheaper. Therefore, my friends, it is the most natural thing in the world for the gentleman from Pittsburg to have apprehensions that the farmer may thereby be seriously injured. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] No wonder my friend is vigorously opposing this measure in behalf of the farmer [laughter] and making for the first time in his life a public confession of his love for the American farmer. [Laughter.]

My friends, we have all observed that the standpat Republican is the one now who is loving the farmer the most. My friend from Pennsylvania shed more tears over the farmer in the last two months, since reciprocity has been before Congress and the country, than all the insurgents on that side. [Laughter.] I want to say that I am glad to see the insurgents now dancing around the fires with the distinguished standpatter of Pennsylvania, Mr. DALZELL, shouting hosannas and hallelujahs to the farmers. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I want to say to him——

Mr. JAMES. And CANNON.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, yes. It is a most delightful thing to see my friends LENROOT, COOPER, NORRIS, MADISON, LINDBERGH, and other insurgents all joining hands around the ring, with my friend DALZELL and my friend CANNON in the middle, singing songs together. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They have a common ground, they have a common love and sympathy and a common desire to fool in the future, as in the past, the American farmer. [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Most assuredly.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman has been saying much about the necessity of accuracy of statement. I voted for the reciprocity agreement, and I am going to vote for it again, and so is the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MADISON.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Good! I commend your patriotism.

Mr. JAMES. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to say that I think there are about three insurgents who are supporting the President's reciprocity bill.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am glad to hear that. We are going to get them all if they vote right.

I have been here with my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] about 11 years, and I have heard him so often, and I have heard him make many a tariff speech, but I never heard him use the name of "farmer" until this reciprocity came up. I have seen him speak for and vote for a tariff, formulated for the purpose of exacting tribute from the farmer, but I do not recall ever to have heard him mention the farmer's name before. He is a new convert to the farmer's rights. And when he made that speech last session his voice was broken and his cheeks wet with tears as he referred to the poor, down-trodden farmer being sacrificed by the President. But, remembering his past record, in the interest of the Steel Trust and the other trusts, and seeing the tears filling his eyes, a line of poetry came to my mind that I used to see in one of the old readers:

Tears, idle tears, I know not whence nor why they come.

[Laughter.]

I do not mind his fooling himself and other Republicans into the belief that this reciprocity measure is in the interest of the protected manufacturers of Pittsburg and Pennsylvania, thereby causing him to oppose it, but what I regret to see is that he has come over to our side, and even invaded the sacred Democratic soil of my own State and fooled some of us Democrats. [Laughter and applause.] He declares his further opposition to the measure because it "compels the farmer to produce in a free-trade market and to buy in a protected market." Why, gentlemen, if that would be its effect, and my friend DALZELL could really convince himself of it, we would expect him, in view of his public record, to be its strongest advocate. That is his policy; that is what he has been advocating ever since he came to Congress. The inspiration of his public life has been to enact tariff laws so that the American farmer, as well as the American laborer, the American doctor, the American lawyer, the American mechanic, the American shopgirl, the American consumer, of whatever avocation, shall be forced to buy here in the highest protected tariff market of the world [applause on the Democratic side], while he knows that the prices for the products of American farmers are fixed in the free-trade markets, in competition with the farm products of every nation [applause on the Democratic side]; and he further knows that the labor of every American citizen, in shop or field or mine or factory, is sold in the free open markets of the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Talk about the free list and protected American labor! Why, everything that an American citizen wears, from his head to his feet, almost everything the American citizen consumes or uses, is on the high tariff list, while all the pauperized labor of all the countries on earth are on the free list. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

He opposes a free list which gives the American farmer, the American laborer, the American consumer some benefit, but is in favor of a free list in labor which gives the Steel Trust, that employs tens of thousands of foreigners, who can not speak the English language, and other protected trusts of Pittsburg and Pennsylvania all the benefit. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I commend to the House the reading of the gentleman's speech. As a protectionist he proves too much. He shows conclusively that American manufacturers do not need protection. He declares, and produces figures to sustain him, that American manufacturers of all kinds are exporting to Canada, in the face of the Canadian tariff, in competition with England, though she has a preferential tariff rate against us, 50 per cent more of their products than do the British manufacturers. He could have added that we are selling Canada, in spite of her tariff, more manufactured products than all the nations of the world combined. It is inconceivable to me how any intelligent man can contend that the American manufacturer needs a high tariff to protect him in our home market against British and other foreign competition, when this same manufacturer is sending his products to Canada, burdened with a tariff one-third heavier than British goods bear, and has actually captured the Canadian market in competition with England and all the other nations of the earth. If our manufacturers can compete and outsell England, with a preferential tariff in her favor, in Canada, it is absurd to say that we can not compete and outsell her here, at our own doors, in the home market. I have said, my friends, that this measure is a Democratic policy.

I have referred to the fact that reciprocity was first urged in 1848 by Robert J. Walker, a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury; that the Democratic administration and a Democratic Congress passed a reciprocity agreement with Canada in 1854 substantially similar with the present proposed one; that under its 12 years of operation our trade with Canada largely increased; that it was repealed by a Republican Congress, against Democratic protest, on the demands of protection and monopolistic greed. The Democratic Party for a half century has advocated freer trade relations and reciprocal agreements with Canada. But some Democrats here and at the other end of the Capitol, to justify their votes against the pending measure, have denounced reciprocity as un-Democratic. Gentlemen who enjoy the franking privilege at both ends of the Capitol have broadcasted my State with denunciations of it as a Republican policy. They have condemned it as against the expressed declaration of our party platforms. They have quoted from the Democratic campaign book of 1902 to prove that our party opposes reciprocity. They have declared that our party in the Senate in 1890, when the McKinley bill was under discussion, bitterly assailed the policy of reciprocity as un-Democratic; that it was the handmaid of protection. They have told the people of my State that Ransom and Vance—the mention of whose names always thrills with conscious pride the heart of every patriotic North Carolinian—fought against and voted against reciprocity because it was un-Democratic. Gentleman who make these charges and send them out to my people ought to know better, and one moment's investigation would show them that there is not a shadow of ground to warrant such assertions. Vance and Ransom, Vest and Beck, as well as other Democratic leaders in the Senate, did vote against the so-called reciprocity amendment of the McKinley bill. They—and, in view of his interviews in the public press on this question, I wish the attention of my friend and colleague from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB]—did denounce it as a "sham reciprocity." But they demanded real reciprocity with Canada and the countries south of us. Senator Gray, of Delaware, a distinguished Democratic Senator, offered an amendment to the McKinley bill providing for reciprocity with Canada and other countries of the Western Hemisphere. This amendment received the solid Democratic vote of the Senate, while the solid Republican vote was cast against it. Ransom and Vance were for it. Neither did any Democrat then nor did the Democratic platform of 1892, which has been garbled in support of the opposition to this bill, condemn reciprocity.

But both the Democratic Senators in 1890 and the platform of 1892 did denounce the Republican sham reciprocity of the McKinley bill. All good Democrats denounced it then, all good Democrats denounce it now, as a sham reciprocity. It failed, as every intelligent man knew it would, to widen the market for a single American product. Instead of providing for the free entry of or the reduction of the tariff on importations, it gave the President power to increase the tariff, to put a tariff tax on tea and coffee that were on the free list; on sugar that the bill itself had placed on the free list, if he should conclude countries exporting such articles imposed unreasonable duties on our products.

Instead of a reduction, it vested the President with the power to increase taxes on American consumption. To show to my people that a vote against this measure is in harmony with Democratic policies and a vote for it is un-Democratic, garbled extracts from the Democratic platform of 1892 have been sent out from Washington to the press of my State. It may not be so interesting to gentlemen here, but the people in my State wish to know the truth, and the whole truth, as to the Democratic position on reciprocity. Let me read the part of the platform which has been scattered throughout my State as a justification for opposing this bill:

> We denounce the sham reciprocity which juggles with the people's desire for enlarged foreign markets and freer exchanges, etc.

The preceding lines of the reciprocity plank in that platform have been omitted in the literature sent to my State.

Let me read that section in the platform as it is:

> SEC. 4. Trade interchange on the basis of reciprocal advantages to the countries participating is a time-honored doctrine of the Democratic faith, but we denounce the sham reciprocity which juggles with the people's desire for enlarged foreign markets and freer exchanges, etc.

You will observe that the three lines showing that reciprocity is a "time-honored doctrine of the Democratic faith" is left out in this antireciprocity literature, and the extract is garbled from the midst of the sentence after the word "but," and makes the platform to read: "We denounce the sham reciprocity," and so forth. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

So, gentlemen, the Democratic platform of 1892 declares that reciprocity is a "time-honored doctrine of the Democratic faith." But if, sirs, that is not sufficiently clear to the doubting, let me read the reciprocity plank in the Democratic platform of 1904:

> RECIPROCITY.
> We favor liberal trade arrangements with Canada, and with peoples of other countries where they can be entered into with benefit to American agriculture, manufactures, mining, or commerce.

Both parties have favored reciprocity. But there is a wide difference between Republican reciprocity and Democratic reciprocity. Republican reciprocity is well defined by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, in the speech to which I have referred, thus:

> Republican reciprocity is reciprocity in noncompeting articles and in nothing else. * * * Products admitted to the United States must not compete with ours. * * * Reciprocity in competing products is absolutely inconsistent with the policy of protection.

He defines Republican reciprocity just as Senator Hale and other Republican Senators in the Senate debates in 1890 and 1892; just as the Republican platforms of 1900 and 1904; just as the Republican Handbook of 1908 did, and just as the report of a majority of the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee at the last session did.

Republicans always heretofore opposed and a majority of them in the House now oppose any reduction or removal of the tariff, by reciprocity or otherwise, that will permit any foreign product to compete with the trusts and manufacturers. A reciprocity such as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] and the other stand-pat Republicans favor is the handmaid of protection. They take the broad, bold stand that no products shall touch the American shores that will compete with the Steel Trust, that will compete with Mr. Aldrich's Rubber Trust, the Woolen Trust, the Sugar Trust, or with any other trust or protected interest that have maintained and controlled the Republican Party for the last quarter of a century. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Senator Vest declared that Democratic reciprocity meant freer trade relations with one or more nations in all articles required to sustain life or give comfort to the American citizen, whether competitive or noncompetitive. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Democratic Party favors now and has always favored that kind of reciprocity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield such time as is necessary for the gentleman from North Carolina to conclude his remarks. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish now to take up one subject or phase of the pending question about which deception and humbugism have been pushed to the limit. I do not know a Democrat or a Republican who does not put his opposition to this measure upon the apparent ground that by removal of the tariff, as to Canada, on agricultural products, such as wheat, corn, barley, and other grain, cattle and other live stock, the American farmer will be injured. Now, gentlemen, I believe that I can show, not only to an intelligent farmer, but I believe that I can show to even a Member of this House, even a Republican Member [laughter], that this tariff on the farmer's products—his wheat, his corn, his rye, his barley, his hogs, his cattle, all of his live stock—is the most transparent deception that was ever perpetrated upon an honest people and that ever discredited the statute books of an honest government. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Why, most assuredly, my friend.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If you are correct in your surmises, why is it that wheat in Dakota is worth over 10 to 12 cents on the bushel more than it is right across the line in Canada, with no difference in freight at all?

Mr. KITCHIN. It is because there is absolutely no foundation for the truth of your statement [applause on the Democratic side], and I am going to show you before I get through, or else I am going to convict every Republican that had charge of the statistical department of this Government for the last 15 years of willfully deceiving the American public. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman further yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If you are right, why, then, has the Tariff Board reported that there is a difference of 10 cents?

Mr. KITCHIN. The Tariff Board has made no such report. But if it has, it is for the same reason that every Republican has in advocating a tariff on the farmer's product, namely, in order to fool the farmers in the West into voting the Republican ticket, so that the trusts and protected interests can continue to maintain the high tariff wall behind which to rob the American farmer and consumer. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Why, certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to ask the gentleman this question: Less than three months ago the gentlemen upon that side of the House opposed the creation of a tariff commission, on the ground that the members of that commission would be the creatures of President Taft. Does the gentleman think this board now is the creature of President Taft, when they have reported contrary to the views expressed by him?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have not seen the views expressed by him, except in his message. But as to the Tariff Board. We took the position on this floor that a tariff board was a cowardly subterfuge—that you Republicans tried to create a tariff board in order to delay the mandate and orders of 14,000,000 of American voters. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And Mr. Taft in a public letter or speech, published in the Republican campaign textbook of 1910, substantiates that position. He declared to the people that the time to have revision was after his Tariff Board had reported, and that it would take the balance of his term for it to accumulate proper data upon which to make a report. But let me read from the Republican textbook exactly what he said:

> Now, I think it is utterly useless, as I think it would be greatly distressing to business, to talk of another revision of the tariff during the present Congress. I should think that it would certainly take the rest of this administration to accumulate the data upon which a new and proper revision of the tariff might be had.

Delay! Delay! That is what you Republicans and your President desired to accomplish by the creation of the Tariff Commission. We knew it was a fraud, and we knew it was proposed and established for purposes of delay. You wanted to extend the lease of the trusts to plunder. You proposed a tariff board not to reduce the tariff but to fool the people again and feed them on more promises. Republican promises are in one respect like United States bonds, payable only at the option of the promiser [laughter on the Democratic side], and you have fooled some of the farmers into the belief that they were just about as good as United States bonds. [Renewed laughter.] But they are getting on to you. You have violated your pledges. You have delayed tariff revision; you have fooled the farmer; you have fed him on promises; and you have done that for 25 years. Now you propose to feed him on some new Tariff Board promises in the hope to fool him some more. [Laughter.] Mr. Taft further said, in a letter to Chairman MCKINLEY, also published in this textbook, that he would make recommendations as to revision or reduction of the tariff only after his Tariff Board made its report either on the entire tariff or on any of the schedules.

Now, then, if the President was candid and sincere in not desiring, for want of proper information or for other reason, to touch the tariff until his Tariff Board reported, why is it that he sends to the Congress a reciprocity tariff measure that affects more than 200 articles produced in this country not only before his own Tariff Board reports but even before it has made an investigation as to any of them? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Oh, do not tell me about your Tariff Board. [Laughter.]

But the gentleman says the Tariff Board does not agree with the President. If the Tariff Board does not agree with the President and with the standpatters for a protective tariff policy, that Tariff Board is not going to last long, and Republicans will soon be clamoring for us to abolish the "blamed old" Tariff Board. [Laughter.] Tariff boards are created by protectionists, of protectionists, and for protectionists, created to promote protection and to obstruct tariff reform.

Did not the gentleman say that the Tariff Board had reported against this reciprocity measure that reduces the tariff? It certainly made no report and no investigation before the President sent his reciprocity message to the last Congress. But if it has since reported against reciprocity, it corroborates what I said: Tariff boards are made to prevent the reduction of the tariff. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

I understand these insurgents in the West. Any man that did not have sympathy with the predicament in which the insurgents of the agricultural West find themselves would not be possessed of the common virtues of a gentleman. [Laughter.] Why, Mr. Chairman, there is not a single insurgent from the West who could retain his seat here if the grain and live-stock farmers of the West were convinced that this Republican tariff on their agricultural products was a fake and a humbug. What other appeal would you have to make to the farmer in Iowa or Wisconsin or Minnesota or Kansas or elsewhere if you should admit that the tariff on the farmer's wheat, corn, live stock, and so forth, is a snare and a fake, as it is? [Laughter.] The very life and political existence of my friend LENROOT and of these other insurgents of the West depends on the fact that the farmer of the agricultural West shall still be kept blind and deceived in the belief that the tariff on his products causes him to get higher prices, and that if the Democrats get into power they will remove the tariff on his products and thereby bankrupt him. You have got to do that, for the very minute you admit—what we are going to prove—that this duty of 25 cents a bushel on wheat and so much on corn and rye and barley and cattle and other farm products is a delusion and a snare, kept there for the express purpose of deceiving your constituents into returning Republicans to Congress, you are undone.

Now, let us take wheat. Oh, yes; these insurgents and these standpatters have been going about the rural districts of this country, and especially in Iowa, and Illinois, and Wisconsin, and Minnesota, and elsewhere out there in the West, telling the people, "Why, gentlemen, you just vote for a Democratic Representative and elect a Democratic Congress and President and he will go there and take the tariff off of your wheat, and off of your corn, and off of your barley, and off of your live stock, and just open these markets to the Canadian wheat and the Canadian corn and other Canadian products, and they will flood our market and destroy the farming industry of the country."

The farmer, being too busy and too tired to investigate himself, often takes your word for it and begins to fear: "Now, here, we must keep the Democrats out, because if the Democrats get in up there in Washington, just as sure as anything in this world they will take the tariff off of wheat and corn and all our stuff, because Mr. LENROOT says they will do it." [Laughter.] Why, gentlemen, I tell you it is absolutely inconceivable to me that any intelligent farmer, or any intelligent man, or even a Republican [laughter], can sit down quietly, without an office sticking up before him, and consider the facts and then arise from his study and say that this tariff on wheat, corn, barley, or other grain, or on cattle and live stock, affects in any way the prices that the farmer receives. You know, I know, and every farmer who is now undeceived by you knows that the tariff on wheat and the farmers' products is absolutely bogus. He knows that the price for his wheat, his barley, his rye, and so forth, as well as his live stock, is fixed not here in America, but in the open markets of the world, in competition with all the world. You know and I know that when we make in this country over a hundred million bushels of wheat more than the American public consumes, that surplus is bound to overflow and go out into the markets of the world in competition with the products of the serfs of Russia, the ryots of India, the fellahs of Egypt to meet at Liverpool and London the surplus wheat of the world from Canada to India, and that surplus fixes the price not only abroad, but fixes the price in the Dakotas, in Minnesota, in Illinois, in every other market of our country. If the surplus shipped abroad does not fix the price, if the farmers of the Middle West or anywhere else in the country do not get as much for their 100,000,000 and more bushels of surplus wheat abroad or their surplus of corn, barley, cattle, and live stock, why, in the name of common sense, do they ship these products abroad when they can get a better price for them at home? I can understand how a farmer who is a big enough fool to let you deceive him into the belief that this tariff is helping him will sell his wheat and other stuff abroad for less than he could get right at home, but I am talking about the intelligent farmers. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. KITCHIN. Why, certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. Upon the same theory, will the gentleman be in favor of placing cotton manufactures of every description upon the free list, where there is also a surplus shipped abroad?

Mr. KITCHIN. Why, you protective-tariff fellows, in order to allow the New England cotton manufacturers to exact exorbitant millions of dollars from the American people, are claiming in every campaign and in every Congress that we do not make enough to supply our own consumption, and you want a tariff wall so high as to shut out foreign goods, and by thus giving our manufacturers a monopoly encourage them to make enough to supply the American market.

Mr. HILL. I do not resent the charge against the New England cotton manufacturers, but I simply suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina that in the last year more cotton has been used in manufacturing in the Southern States than in New England.

Mr. KITCHIN. Why, certainly; I hope it is true. We in the South intend to make the New England mills come down and put their mills there, or else go out of business. [Applause.] Because with the cotton right at home, right at our own mills, with the best labor, the most honest labor, and the most orderly labor in the world, we can compete in cotton goods with the world. We are not asking for protection, but you people have been asking our southern mills and trying to fool them into joining you in demanding high protection, so that New England may have the benefit of it. New England is exporting few cotton goods. She is extorting oppressive prices from the American consumer under this tariff; but I want to say to my friend from Connecticut that we are going to break up that system. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. I would like to ask the gentleman for an honest confession, if his own honest manufacturers from North Carolina did not appear here two years ago and demand higher rates?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know whether an honest manufacturer from North Carolina came here or not. We have a great many cotton manufacturers in North Carolina that came from Connecticut, the State of the gentleman. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do.

Mr. FOCHT. I would like the gentleman from North Carolina, in this connection, with reference to the manufacturers of the South, to explain at length clearly something of the nature of the labor that is employed in these mills of his State.

Mr. KITCHIN. What State is the gentleman from?

Mr. FOCHT. Pennsylvania.

Mr. KITCHIN. I assert that the labor of North Carolina gets more for their work than 90 per cent of the labor in Pennsylvania.

Mr. FOCHT. I deny that.

Mr. KITCHIN. The labor bulletins issued by the Republican department here show that in Pennsylvania, in its coal mines, in the iron mines, in the steel works, and many other protected industries labor is paid less and works longer hours than in any other State in the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FOCHT. I deny that, either on the farm, factory, or anywhere. I would like to ask the gentleman to give us some educational statistics.

Mr. KITCHIN. Why, gentlemen, it never bothers me to hear a Republican repudiate the truth; that is a habit with them. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FOCHT. Oh, you repudiate your debts even, in the South.

Mr. KITCHIN. Here is an original bill that I hold in my hand, just handed me, an account with a coal miner, who received for 12 days' work in the mines of Pennsylvania the great and munificent sum, under the protective tariff of the Payne-Aldrich Act, $8.40. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FOCHT. He did not earn any more or he would have received it; they are paid by the ton.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, gentlemen, let me return to this bogus tariff on wheat and other farm products, and show you what a humbug it is.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I find that it is usual for men to give an opinion on subjects that pertain to matters farthest from where they reside.

Mr. KITCHIN. In other words, upon subjects they know nothing about. If so, I am going to yield to the gentleman and let him talk. [Laughter and applause.] If the gentleman wants to learn the truth to-day, wants really to learn something about wheat and the tariff on agricultural products, if he will take his seat, and if it gets too hot for him I will have the pages throw water on it—— [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I am very cool now.

Mr. KITCHIN. If he will possess himself in patience and keep cool I am going to show him that no Republican in the House can stand up and say that he honestly wants to ascertain the truth and then go back home and say that the tariff on the farmer's grain and cattle and live stock and other farm products helps him or that its removal will injure him.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman permit a question? I really ought not to have prefaced my question, and I will withdraw it.

Mr. KITCHIN. It is always dangerous to have a preamble. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Now, I want some information about wheat.

Mr. KITCHIN. All right, I will give it to you. I have it right here, provided the Republican statisticians that have been in office here 12 or 15 years are correct.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The gentleman has stated that the price of wheat is fixed in Liverpool.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and in London.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Does the gentleman know that we raise different grades of wheat in the United States?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Does the gentleman know that in the Northwest United States, especially in Minnesota, the banner wheat State of the United States, and in the Dakotas, which are next to it, we raise what is called No. 1 northern and No. 1 hard spring wheat?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will take what you say about that to be true.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Does the gentleman know that to be a fact?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have heard that, yes. Go ahead.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman inform me how much of the Dakota and Minnesota No. 1 northern or No. 1 hard spring wheat has ever been exported to Liverpool or anywhere else?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know how much of that particular kind has been exported to Liverpool or any other place.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That particular grade.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will tell the gentleman this, that if that particular grade is grown in India or in Russia or in Canada or elsewhere, then that particular grade in Canada or in India or Russia brings the same price in the markets as the Minnesota and Dakota wheat. If there is any difference, which some of the Minnesota gentlemen contend, in the Winnipeg and Duluth and Minneapolis markets, it is on account of this superior quality of the Minneapolis and Duluth wheat, and not on account of the tariff, as I shall later show.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I will state this to the gentleman: No. 1 northern and No. 1 hard of Winnipeg is occasionally exported to Liverpool, but I would like to have the gentleman show me where one bushel of No. 1 northern or No. 1 hard of the Minnesota and Dakota wheat, of which we raise about 200,000,000 bushels annually, was ever exported across the water at all; and the reason is that there has been for the last 10 years a difference of from 11 to 15 cents a bushel between the price in Canada and in North Dakota and Minnesota.

Mr. KITCHIN. And that same difference——

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Those are the facts.

Mr. KITCHIN. And that same difference, if it be, exists between Nebraska and Illinois and Kansas wheat?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. They do not ship the Minnesota and Dakota wheat to those places. They manufacture it in Minneapolis.

Mr. KITCHIN. And Winnipeg——

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That goes to Liverpool because it is from 11 to 15 cents a bushel cheaper than it is right across the line in the Dakotas.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am going to make a challenge to the gentleman now.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It is the same kind of wheat, too.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman can not find quotations in any daily paper, published in Minneapolis or Duluth or elsewhere in the United States, showing that wheat is 11 to 15 cents higher in Minneapolis, or other point in the United States, than wheat of the same grade in Canada or other markets of the world, exclusive of the difference in transportation charges.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I can show that for the last 10 years absolutely from personal knowledge on that grade of wheat.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman want to make the point that in Minnesota and Dakota a superior grade of wheat is grown to that of any other country?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I do.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then, that is the reason, if you have a superior grade to that of any other country, to that of Canada, that Canada can not compete with you. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the gentleman yield? Did I understand the gentleman to say that if they raise the same wheat in Canada the price would be the same?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I want to say that they do raise identically the same wheat.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then the gentleman does not agree with the gentleman from Minnesota. He says they do not; that a superior grade is grown in Minnesota and the Dakotas.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But the gentleman from North Carolina misunderstood the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota rose.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, we are going to debate this question just as long as you gentlemen wish, long enough for you to deceive, or try to deceive, the American farmer again as you have in the past. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] made one statement and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] makes another statement, and they cross——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. KITCHIN. You two gentlemen can go out into the cloakroom and settle your contradictions about Minnesota and Dakota and Canadian wheat, but do not come in here and take up the time of men who are trying to teach you Republicans the truth about this wheat situation. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I will say to the gentleman this: That because of the climate and the soil the same quality of wheat is raised along the border in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta that is raised in North Dakota, Minnesota, and Montana, and the difference in price on that grade of wheat is from 11 to 15 cents a bushel, just one side of the line or the other, cheaper on the Canadian side than on the United States side, and has been so for 15 years.

Mr. KITCHIN. I need not carry on any controversy with the gentleman longer, because that statement is exactly contrary to the statement that he made awhile ago to the effect that Minnesota and Dakota grew a superior grade of wheat to that of Canada or any other country.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Not at all.

Mr. KITCHIN. If the gentleman wants to make an amendment to it, I will accept his amendment and go ahead.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. My statements are exactly alike.

Mr. KITCHIN. If there is the difference to which the gentleman refers in the price of wheat in Minnesota and in Canada, it is bound to be on account of the superiority of grade or of freight rates, or both. I again challenge gentlemen to produce, now or hereafter in this debate, statistics from the department or quotations from any daily papers showing there was as much difference as 11 to 15 cents per bushel in the price of wheat of the same grade at Minneapolis and Winnipeg. I challenge you to show by the statistics of the department or quotations from the press that there was as much difference in the price of wheat between the Minneapolis and Winnipeg markets as there was between the Minneapolis and the Chicago markets. You will find, as I have found, and everyone will find, that wheat in Chicago, the great wheat market of this country, is from 2 to 5 cents less than wheat quoted in the Winnipeg market and many other markets in Canada, and higher in the Canadian market than in the Cincinnati, St. Louis, and many other markets in this country.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman permit——

Mr. KITCHIN. So if there is from 11 to 15 cents difference between wheat at Winnipeg and Minneapolis, there is a much greater difference between wheat at Minneapolis and Chicago. Do you want a tariff wall between Chicago and Minneapolis? [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] If the tariff, as you contend, makes the difference between wheat at Minneapolis and Winnipeg, what makes the greater difference between wheat at Minneapolis and Chicago? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The Chicago market, let me inform the gentleman, is based upon southern winter wheat and not upon Canadian northern No. 1 hard——

Mr. KITCHIN. The South makes practically no wheat for the market.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I will give you some exact data from the record.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I have not time to yield for that purpose.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I thought the gentleman wanted information.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman can put it in his speech. Of course, I understand very readily why the gentleman wants to put it in my speech, because he is ambitious, and he knows that my speech will be read. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] And if he puts it in his speech he fears that nobody will ever read it except himself and his secretary. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CULLOP. I want to suggest to the gentleman that the quotations on yesterday show that May wheat was 88½ cents per bushel in Chicago and 91 cents in Winnipeg, showing Canada wheat about 3 cents a bushel higher than our wheat, and it is so all the time; that is, about 3 cents a bushel higher than ours.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes. Just as I stated some moments ago, quotations are higher in Winnipeg than in Chicago.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. And 96 cents in Minneapolis, the great wheat market of the world.

Mr. CULLOP. Yes; but Minneapolis does not supply all the wheat in the Union or regulate the wheat trade of the world. That was only a local condition existing there. Now, one other question. One gentleman said the President's proposal as to reciprocity with Canada made the price of wheat go down. I want to ask if it made wheat go down, did it not also make barley go up, which was quoted yesterday at $1.12 a bushel in our markets, the highest price ever known in the production of that grain for years? If it made wheat go down, then it surely made barley go up.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. I do.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask a question of the gentleman from North Carolina, and that is if it is not a stock Republican protection argument, and of other protectionists, that whenever you remove a duty from a foreign article that the foreigner immediately raises the price of the foreign article to the American level, and that the American consumer does not get the benefit of it?

Mr. KITCHIN. Why, they make any kind of argument that is inconsistent and fallacious. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. And according to that argument Canadian wheat will immediately go up on the passage of this reciprocal trade agreement——

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. And it did, and ours went down 10 or 11 cents.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to approach the Canadian and foreign wheat ghost. Why, they tell us, if we remove the tariff the wheat of Canada and of the world is going to flow in to us. What is going to bring it here? Who needs it here? Would not the wheat farmer of Canada, of Argentina, and of Russia be the biggest fool in the world to try to ship his wheat here when we are already producing more than 120,000,000 bushels more than we need, more than we can sell here, more than the American public consumes, and which we are yearly sending abroad, in grain and flour, to the markets of the world? Why do we want their surplus? Who is going to buy an article when he has got more of it than he needs and is trying to dispose of the surplus? Let us see about this immense wheat flood that is going to inundate the United States and that seems to alarm our friends so much.

Since the Statistical Abstract for 1910 is not yet published, I shall use the four years from 1906 to 1909, both inclusive. Let me remind my frightened friends that the total imports of wheat from all the world for these four years amounted in value to only $656,000, while we exported for the same years, in competition with Canada and all the other wheat-producing nations of the earth, over $256,000,000 worth, and in addition to this over $236,000,000 of flour made of American wheat. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We produced that much more than we needed for home consumption, more than the American public could consume. In other words, we exported in this enormous surplus to the markets of the world in competition with Canadian wheat, with Indian wheat, with Argentine wheat, with Russian wheat, 400 times as much wheat and over 225 times as much flour as we imported from all the world.

And yet as against this stupendous amount—these hundreds of millions of dollars of wheat sold abroad by us in competition with the world at a better price than at home—these antireciprocity gentlemen are trying to scare the farmers to death with this little half million dollars of wheat imported here, perhaps as seed wheat for the farmers. You can fool the Republican farmers out in Wisconsin and Minnesota and other Western States, but I just dare you to come down into North Carolina where the intelligent farmers raise a little wheat and try such a poppy-cock argument on them. [Laughter.]

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will.

Mr. JAMES. If the argument made by our Republican friends is true, that wheat sells for more here than it does in Canada, and the farmer would be affected by free wheat, why was it that the American farmer shipped $256,000,000 worth of wheat abroad and sold it there when he could have sold it for more here at home?

Mr. KITCHIN. Their argument is not true, and the fact is that every bushel of this enormous amount of wheat brought a better price abroad than they could get at home. That is the reason it was sold there. Now, as to corn. No man outside of the insane asylum and the Republican Party believes or has the cheek to insist that a tariff on corn affects its price. We grow in the United States 80 per cent of the corn of the world. In the four years 1906 to 1909, inclusive, we exported $165,460,335 worth of corn, while we imported of all kinds and for seed purposes only $216,796; that is, we exported more than 700 times as much as we imported. We exported to Canada in the last four years over $20,000,000 worth of corn, while we imported practically none. But still there are Republicans who go back to Iowa, Illinois, Wisconsin, Nebraska, and other corn-growing States and tell the farmers that President Taft and the old Democrats down here are trying to destroy the corn industry of the West by removing the tariff and admitting the Canadian corn to swamp our markets [laughter], when there is not an agricultural township in any State in the West that does not produce more corn annually than does Canada with all her Provinces. I shall not discuss further this bogus corn tariff. In fact, every honest man and some Republicans [laughter] admit that the tariff does not and can not influence in the least the price of corn. Let us take some other products of the farm, such as barley, oats, rye, cattle, and horses. In these four years we exported $21,087,222 worth of barley and imported only $258,755, or nearly 100 times as much as we imported, and last year we imported less than $1,500 worth and exported more than $4,500,000. Of rye, we exported $4,700,781 worth and we imported only $197 worth, or over 20,000 times as much as we imported. Of oats, we exported $19,335,127 worth and imported $2,868,775 worth, or over 6 times as much as we imported. Now, as to horses and cattle. We exported in the four years $124,042,692 worth of horses and imported, exclusive of horses for breeding purposes, only $4,089,831 worth, or more than 30 times as much as we imported. Take cattle. Our exports of cattle for the four years amounted to the large sum of $124,042,692, while our imports, exclusive of cattle for breeding purposes, amounted to only $4,089,831; that is, we exported, in competition with the cattle raisers of the world, more than 30 times as many as we imported. In addition to this we exported over $125,000,000 of beef products. In the four years we exported of hog products—hams, bacon, shoulders, pork, lard, and so forth—the enormous sum of $450,000,000, while we imported practically none.

Mr. Chairman, in the face of such facts, showing that we are producing a surplus of such agricultural products far in excess of American consumption, far more than we can sell in the United States, which surplus must seek foreign markets in competition with the world, which markets, by the law of supply and demand, must fix the price both at home and abroad, it is incredible to me that any intelligent, honest man will continue to insist that the tariff here on such farm products does or can affect the prices.

But, it is asked, if the surplus shipped abroad fixes the price of the farmer's product at home and it is unaffected by the tariff, why does not the surplus of manufactured products, such as those of the meat packers and the United States Steel Corporation, shipped abroad, fix the home price, unaffected by the tariff? The answer is easy. If the farmers could combine and organize in a trust, such as the Meat Trust, the Steel Trust, and other trusts, thereby having the power to control the output, to say when, where, and how much should be put on the market and to fix the price, they could take advantage of the tariff and charge their purchasers in the home market the world-market price plus the tariff. But, being so many in number and so diffused and scattered throughout the country, it is impossible for them to so combine and organize. On the other hand, the meat packers, the steel, and many other manufacturing plants are so few in number and vast in influence they can and do organize into trusts, control the output, fix the price, hold up the American consumer to the world price plus the tariff, and then sell their surplus abroad to the foreigners at the cheaper world-market price.

Mr. Chairman, I am anxious to expose, once and for all, this tariff fraud and deception that have been practiced on the American farmer, especially the farmer of the West, by the Republican Party for the last third of a century. I have attempted to show by the logic and reason of the thing, from the facts and statistics, that the tariff on the farmer's products, wheat, rye, corn, barley, oats, cattle and live stock, and so forth, is absolutely bogus. I shall now undertake to sustain the proposition by authorities so high, respectively, both in Democratic and Republican opinion, that neither Democrat nor Republican can dispute. I wish to say that if any Democrat, in his opposition to reciprocity, takes the position that it is going to hurt the farmer by a removal of the tariff from his products, he will be giving the lie to Democratic campaign speeches, Democratic campaign books, and Democratic Senators and Members of the House for all these years. It has been the Democratic position, sustained by the facts and by common experience, that this tariff on the farmer's product is a fraud and a delusion and put on by the Republicans to catch and fool the farmer into electing a Republican Congress so that it might write tariff laws to enable the monopolists to fasten their relentless grasp on the throats of the 90,000,000 American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let me read to my Democratic friends extracts from speeches and reports of the Democratic leaders of the past.

The late Senator Beck, Kentucky's great Senator and statesman, in a minority report against the tariff bill reported by the Republican Committee on Finance in the Senate in 1888, said:

> Intelligent men everywhere concede that protection can not protect any product of this country which is raised or prepared for market here cheaper than it can be elsewhere, or is produced in such quantities that our own people can not consume it. Cotton, wheat, beef, pork, provisions, tobacco, oils, and dozens of other things illustrate this.
> It is absurd to talk about protecting either cotton or wheat.

I will now read from the report of the Democratic Ways and Means Committee, in 1890, against the McKinley bill:

> For the further purpose of inducing the farmers of the country to believe that they can and will derive some benefit from the protective policy, this bill imposes various rates of duty upon certain important agricultural products which it is well known could not be imported to any material extent with or without duty. For instance, corn is subjected to a duty of 15 cents a bushel; corn meal, 20 cents a bushel; oats, 15 cents per bushel; rye, 10 cents per bushel; wheat, 25 cents per bushel; wheat flour, 25 per cent ad valorem, etc.

* * * * * * *

We produce a great surplus of all these articles and many others every year, which we are compelled to send abroad and sell in the free markets of the world in competition with similar products from other countries.

It is impossible to protect the farmer against foreign competition in his home market for he has no such competition, and the insertion or retention of these articles in a tariff bill is a device which will deceive no one who gives a moment's thought to the subject.

* * * * * * *

This statement shows how futile it is to attempt to afford protection to the farmers of the country by imposing duties upon the importation of these products, and this large and intelligent class of citizens can not be reconciled in this way to a policy which increases taxes upon their clothing, tableware, carpets, earthenware, glassware, agricultural implements, and other necessary articles.

This report was signed by such men as John G. Carlisle, R. Q. Mills, Benton McMillan, C. R. Breckenridge, and R. P. Flower.

I call attention to the report of Hon. William L. Wilson, in behalf of the Democratic Ways and Means Committee, in 1894:

Of the staple agricultural products, including meats and provisions, we are such large exporters, and must continue to be such large exporters, that any duties upon them are useless for protection and fruitless for revenue, and generally can only be imposed for the purpose of deluding the less intelligent of our farmers into the belief that they are receiving some consideration and benefit under the tariff, although the prices of their products are fixed in the world's market in competition with like products produced by the cheapest labor of the world. For the producers of our great export staples, which, having fully supplied the home market, must overflow and seek large purchases elsewhere, the only effect of a protective tariff is to take from one-fourth to one-half of the products for which they could exchange their surplus should they venture to buy in the market where they are obliged to sell or to compel them to give a like portion of the avails of their labor, when turned into money, by increasing the cost of what they buy in the home market.

Senator Vest, the great Senator from Missouri, who for years was the Democratic leader of the Senate, in a speech made in the Senate on August 27, 1890, said:

Now, we ought to be perfectly candid with each other. These increases are made to catch the farmer vote under the pretense that an increase duty, where there is no competition at all, helps the farmer. I do not know an intelligent man in this country who is not aware that there is no competition whatever between foreign cattle that are brought into this country and those we raise. It is the most transparent humbug that was ever attempted, even in politics.

* * * * * * *

Mr. President, is there any man who does not know that what the farmers of this country need is more market, not more protection? They want more opportunity to sell.

If Senators will turn to the wheat importation, to which we shall come directly, which was manufactured on the same fraudulent basis to impose upon the farmers, it will be found that we exported in 1889 46,000,000 bushels of wheat and imported 1,998.

This whole schedule—the agricultural schedule—made to allure the farmer into the belief that it is for his protection, is manufactured in the same way and for the same purpose.

Senator Beck, Senator Vest, Mr. Carlisle, Mr. Wilson, and all the Democratic leaders denounced it as fraud and humbug. I want now to call the attention of the House, and especially the attention of my State colleagues to the opinion of Senator Zeb Vance, North Carolina's great commoner, whose public life to this day is, and I trust will ever be, the inspiration of its Democracy. In a speech in the Senate he said:

Now, sir, here are three great classes of producers of our country—the agriculturists, the miners, and the manufacturers—and they have made this compact—or, at least, it has been made for them—that the taxes are to be levied upon the articles made by the manufacturer for their "encouragement" and "protection" against competition; and taxes have been levied upon articles that compete with the miners who dig ores of iron and coal and everything of that kind from the soil. To give it the appearance of equality and justice tariffs are also levied upon the wheat, and the corn, and the oats, and the cotton, and so forth, grown by the farmer. That, on paper, looks fair, but it so happens that it is a reality for the manufacturer and miner and it is a delusion and snare for the farmer.

The miners and the manufacturers together have grown rich and accumulated enormous wealth by this protective arrangement. But how has it been with the farmer? He has found that there is nothing to compete with him. A duty of 25 cents a bushel is laid upon his wheat, 10 cents on his corn, and so forth, but it turns out, in fact and in truth, that there is no competition with him coming from abroad; there is nothing to protect him against.

I say, therefore, that when this beautiful theory of protection came into practice, while it was a reality, and a substantial reality, for the manufacturer and miner, the agricultural man finds it to be a delusion and a cheat.

The prices of all his products are fixed by the markets abroad; and why? Because he makes more than will supply the home market and the surplus which goes abroad fixes the price of what is sold in the home market.

Vance denounced it as a cheat and delusion, yet we have Democrats that want to go back to North Carolina and tell the people that old "Zeb" Vance when he denounced this tariff as a fraud was lying [applause], and that the Republicans were telling the truth when they said that this tariff was a genuine benefit to the farmer. The people of my State will ask the question: Who is right, "Zeb" Vance or these antireciprocity Democrats? I venture the statement that whenever you see a good Democrat against this reciprocity bill you must scratch a little deeper than corn, rye, barley, oats, live stock, and so forth, to find the real reason for the opposition. [Applause.]

Scratch a little and you will find lumber reduction [laughter and applause]; and a little deeper and you will find wood-pulp reduction, and the biggest wood-pulp plant south of the Potomac is in North Carolina; scratch a little deeper and you will find some mica reduction, and there is some mica made in North Carolina. [Applause and laughter.] Now, when a Republican President and many Republicans here are willing to concede that they have been fooling the farmers for 30 years about the tariff on their products, some of our Democrats come along and say, "Do not admit that, because we want to fool the farmer as you have been doing, and get protection for lumber in our State, for wood pulp and mica in our districts." [Laughter.] Gentlemen, I can stand here and read all day extracts from Democratic reports of the House and Senate, from Democratic campaign books, and from leading Democrats in denunciation of this tariff fraud. It is unjust to the Democratic Party, unjust to its record; it is unjust to great Democrats like Beck, Vest, Carlisle, McMillin, Wilson, Ransom, and Vance for Democrats in this House now to repudiate their teachings and the position of the Democratic Party and adopt the old worn-out, threadbare Republican argument of deception. I am going to quote from one gentleman in North Carolina, living to-day, and who has the confidence of thousands of Democrats in the State, and whose opinion upon this question of the tariff on the farmer's product will be taken as authority by many people in North Carolina. That gentleman, if it is not unparliamentary, is the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. SIMMONS has been a Senator for nearly 12 years. He is and has been for years a leading Democratic figure in North Carolina. He was for years chairman of the Democratic executive committee of that State. He was when he was elected to the Senate, and he remained for years, the chairman of the Democratic State executive committee. In the campaign of 1902 Senator Pritchard, a Republican Senator from North Carolina, was making a canvass for his reelection. Senator SIMMONS, as chairman of the Democratic executive committee, on the 11th day of October, 1902, made a great speech in reply to Senator Pritchard, answering the arguments and showing the fallacy of the Republican position on the tariff. The Democratic executive committee was so impressed with the logic and strength of his argument that it sent out through the State as a campaign document many thousand copies of this speech. I want every friend of Senator SIMMONS here and in North Carolina to read that speech. Permit me to read a part of it, to which I call the especial attention of my State colleagues:

The truth is, the whole Republican argument that tariff regulates the price of farm products is utterly false. Every corn and wheat and cotton farmer knows that the price of these crops is regulated by the laws of supply and demand, that we export of these crops from one-fifth to one-third of all we produce, and that the price of the whole crop is regulated by the price which the surplus brings in the foreign markets. The cotton and corn and wheat farmer knows that the bulk of that part of his crop which he does not sell at home for home consumption is purchased for shipment abroad, and the purchaser does not pay him any more than it will bring when sold abroad.

Our chief raw materials are cotton, corn, wheat, and other products of the farm which can not be benefited by protection, because we export them in large quantities.

That was Mr. SIMMONS's carefully prepared, carefully written, and carefully delivered speech, not only as our Senator, but as a leader of North Carolina Democracy; and yet in the face of that there are Democratic gentlemen in this Capitol—and it is unparliamentary to name them here—who enjoy the franking privilege, who in justification of their opposition to this measure are spreading with approval throughout North Carolina the old, fraudulent Republican argument that the tariff on agricultural products is a great benefit to the farmer and its removal will greatly injure him.

Mr. GUDGER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question, and that is whether he refers to me when he speaks about gentlemen sending out Senator SIMMONS's or any other man's speech under a franking privilege?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; I said it may be unparliamentary for me to use the name. Of course, it would not be unparliamentary for me to use the gentleman's name here. [Laughter.]

Mr. GUDGER. Does not the gentleman think it would be fairer to name the party than to leave the suspicion that because I oppose reciprocity I am one of those men?

Mr. KITCHIN. Did the gentleman have the franking privilege when Mr. SIMMONS's speech was sent out?

Mr. GUDGER. I have had the privilege of franking ever since I was elected to Congress.

Mr. KITCHIN. And what was the gentleman's question?

Mr. GUDGER. I asked the gentleman if he does not think it would be fairer to name the men who are sending out Senator SIMMONS's speech rather than to leave the reflection upon all of us from North Carolina who are opposing reciprocity?

Mr. KITCHIN. I presume that the gentleman who made that speech is sending it out. [Laughter.]

Mr. GUDGER. Then why does not the gentleman say so?

Mr. KITCHIN. But it is unparliamentary to say so in this body [laughter], because we are not permitted to criticize or even use the sacred name of a Senator of the United States in such a body as this. [Laughter.]

Gentlemen, that is not all. This same distinguished gentleman from North Carolina, who honors us in the Senate, made a speech on June 25, 1910, only a few months ago, and that speech was such a good one that the campaign committee sent it out in the Democratic campaign book of 1910. In that speech he said:

> The tariff does not help the farmer either to fix or control the volume of his products or their market value. As to his products the tariff is almost entirely inoperative, even when a duty is imposed pretendedly for their protection. Neither can he control nor influence the prices of his products. That is determined by natural law, over which he has no control.

In this speech he contends, and truly so, that the prices of the farmer's products are fixed in the markets of the world in competition with the world, and he denounces the tariff on his products as a "fake." And yet, within a few short months after, on the 3d day of March, 1911, this same distinguished gentleman made a speech in the Senate, which has been widely circulated in my State, in opposition to the Canadian reciprocity, putting such opposition on the grounds that the removal of the tariff on agricultural products, even as to Canada, would be "oppression to the farmer"; that it would "press down the price of farm products."

I shall refrain from any comments on such a sudden and complete change of position, and shall refuse to scratch for the reason. I might make the observation, however, that there is in the reciprocity bill a removal of the tariff on rough lumber, on wood pulp, and many other tariff reductions.

Gentlemen, I have read you Democratic authority; now I am going to produce Republican authority to the effect that the farmer's tariff is a fake and a fraud. The distinguished Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], in a most elaborate speech in the Senate on January 28, 1910, contended that the tariff on agricultural products, of which we made a surplus and exported, had no influence on the prices of such products. I will read a short extract from it:

> There are articles upon which a tariff duty is imposed which this country exports and would not import under any system of duties, because we have a surplus for sale. Under this head comes practically all the food products, both vegetable and animal, and a removal of the duties on food products would obviously have little or no effect on the prices, because we export such articles and can sell them in the world's market at a profit.

He, however, overlooked the fact, established by the hard experience of the American consumer, that when the farmer's raw products gets into the hands of the trusts and becomes their finished product, then the trusts, such as the Meat Trust, charge our own people the world's price with the high tariff added, while they sell their surplus abroad at the lower price of the world's market.

Senator LODGE may not be good authority in the opinion of some of the Republicans here. I understand why you insurgent Republicans will not believe anything that a standpat Senator like Mr. LODGE says, but I have insurgent authority. Where is that renowned New England insurgent, an insurgent always, the Hon. AUGUSTUS PEABODY GARDNER? Where is he? [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I am here. [Laughter.]

Mr. KITCHIN. As I said, I do not blame you insurgents for not believing anything that a standpat Republican says. I do not believe much they say myself. But you must believe what your colleague and insurgent friend says. Now, gentlemen, the older Members will recollect that beautiful chart that was exhibited here before us on the 24th of February of last year by my friend, the honorable insurgent from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], and his eloquent speech, in which he attempted to prove and to be used as a Republican campaign document, and, I believe, was used in the campaign book, that the prices of foodstuffs, of the farmer's products—wheat, corn, meat, and so forth—were lower here than in any other nation under the sun. It was a confession on his part, by chart and speech, that the Republicans had been hoodwinking the farmers all these years.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Do I understand you to include wheat?

Mr. KITCHIN. You included flour. What do you make flour out of? I will include wheat. Reread your speech and you will find wheat included and discussed.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. It was not there. Naval vessels do not buy wheat for their crews. That chart showed the actual prices paid by the naval training ship Ranger for its crew.

Mr. KITCHIN. Did you not then prove or try to prove, and did you not assert, that the prices of farm products were lower here than anywhere else in the world?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I do not remember such statements. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] And I defy the gentleman to find a single word in my speech which will uphold that contention.

Mr. KITCHIN. Of course, I do not want to waste my time reading a Republican speech. [Laughter.] I know what you said here. I do not know how that speech reads in the RECORD. I will say now to the new Members who have just entered Congress that a speech made on this floor is sometimes entirely different from the speech put into the RECORD. We have a sort of courtesy here—letting a fellow revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

But I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER], I do know what took place in this Chamber, because I replied to his speech the next day and showed how ridiculous it was for him and the Republican Party to go up and down this country, in the agricultural sections, as they had been doing for 30 years, preaching to the farmer that the price of his products was raised and kept high by the Republican tariff, and then at that late day admit that they had been deceiving the farmer all the time—that the tariff had nothing to do with the prices of his products; that they were lower here than in any other country.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. KITCHIN. I yield; certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I find that the chart which I exhibited last year——

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, what the gentleman said was a great deal more significant and interesting than what he showed on the chart.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I trust the gentleman will allow me to make a full statement, inasmuch as he has made an imputation. I did not mention either flour or wheat when I told the relative prices paid in the nine foreign ports and in the port of Boston by the Massachusetts training ship Ranger. I did, however, read the following statement, and this is the only thing that would justify the gentleman in his assertion:

> The immigrant finds on coming to America that if he can buy in quantity (and in cases when he need not) his flour, fuel, potatoes, etc., all cost less than in the land he left.
> [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. All of which, Mr. Chairman, sustains my argument. But the gentleman did in his speech, if not in his chart, discuss wheat and attempted to show that it was as high or higher elsewhere than here.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. KITCHIN. I will get Mr. UNDERWOOD to give the gentleman all the time he desires.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. No, sir; that is not fair. Those are the words of Samuel Gompers that I was reading to you. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, I want to say this, as I said then, if you indorse what Samuel Gompers says, it is the first time you or any other Republican ever indorsed anything that a labor leader said. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Do you want to contradict him? Are you contradicting him as usual? North Carolina, unlike Massachusetts, is not a labor State.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am going to give you all the time to explode in after I get through. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Do not attack me by saying that I print in the RECORD words which I do not utter on the floor of the House, unless I have the express permission of the House to do so, and do not say that I suppress anything which I utter.

Mr. KITCHIN. I say, and every Republican and every Democrat in the House at that time knows it, that the whole burden of the gentleman's argument here before the House was that the prices of food products in this country were lower than they were in any other country in the world, and every man knows that was the gentleman's argument, and I do not care what he put in the RECORD.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I absolutely admit that that statement of the gentleman is correct, and that food prices are lower here; but what I object to is the statement of the gentleman that I suppressed words which I had uttered on the floor of this House. I have never done so since I have been in Congress.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman might omit them by mistake; but the gentleman admits now that I am right, that the farmer's products must go out into the world and meet the competition of the world, and that the prices of farm products are as low or lower here than anywhere else on the face of the earth. I have been trying to prove here for the last hour what the gentleman now admits. This being true, the tariff does not affect the price of the wheat, barley, corn, rye, cattle, and other live stock of the American farmer, and a removal of the tariff from them can not, therefore, diminish the price and injure the farmer.

I shall now proceed to unmask with its own hand the Republican Party, and out of its own mouth expose in its nakedness its false pretense and deception, to which the American farmer has been a patient victim for the last third of a century.

On February 9, 1910, the Senate, under resolution, appointed a select committee to investigate the prices of commodities and the cause of any increase in same. The Republican members were Senators LODGE, of Massachusetts; GALLINGER, of New Hampshire; MCCUMBER, of North Dakota; SMOOT, of Utah; and CRAWFORD, of South Dakota. The Democratic members were Senators CLARKE, of Arkansas; JOHNSTON, of Alabama; and SMITH, of South Carolina. After months of investigation report was made to the Senate, the Republican members filing the majority and the Democratic members a minority report. I hold in my hands both reports. I call the attention of the House—and I wish every farmer in the country could hear it—that this unanimous report of the Republican Senators, after a full and thorough investigation, expressly declares that the tariff on wheat, corn, rye, barley, oats, cattle, and live stock, and the agricultural products has nothing to do with their prices. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It further declares that the prices of these products of the farm are fixed in the markets of the world, and it contends and produces figures to show that these products are higher in London and Liverpool and the world's markets than they are here in high-protection United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But let me read from this remarkable report:

The tariff seems to have been no material factor in causing the advance in prices during the last decade. The greatest advances have been made in commodities upon which the tariff has little or no effect, and the absolute removal of the tariff on many of these commodities could not afford any relief at the present time, for the reason that the prices of these commodities, with a few exceptions, were as high or higher in other countries than in the United States.

It then mentions, as the articles which the tariff does not and can not affect, "the principal farm grains—barley, corn, oats, rye, and wheat—cattle, and live stock."

I have not time to quote more, but it devotes page after page in proof that the tariff does not and can not have any influence one way or the other on their prices; that the prices for them, both at home and abroad, are fixed in the markets of the world; that these prices are as high, and in many markets higher, than in the United States. In other words, it confesses that this tariff is a fraud and false pretense practiced on the farmer. As I said, the Democratic Senators on that committee filed a minority report. While there was much difference of opinion as to the effect of the tariff on other subjects, both reports, majority and minority, agreed on the fact that the tariff on these products of the farm had absolutely nothing to do with their prices; that such a tariff was purely bogus. I commend this report by Republican Senators to the reading of every Republican.

Mr. Chairman, this is not all. I shall now produce an authority which should forever estop the Republican Party from again palming off on the people, and especially the farmer, its old, false, and fraudulent argument that the tariff on the farmer's product affects and increases its price. I have here the campaign book for 1910 of the Republican Party, entitled "Republican Textbook." I am going to quote from it in order to nail forever the bald admission by the Republican Party of its willful and persistent deception of the American farmer. Turn to page 144, and we read:

The present advance in prices is, as has been stated, primarily an advance in farm products and food of domestic production. * * * The tariff seems to have been no material factor in causing advance in prices during the past decade. * * * The advance in prices during the last 10 years appears to have no relation with tariff legislation.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

But more. From pages 146 and 147, we read:

That the tariff is not the cause of the present advance is conclusively shown by the fact that the greatest advance has been made in commodities which are usually produced in such quantities to furnish a large surplus to other countries.

Of such products it mentions "barley, corn, oats, rye, wheat," and live stock, "consisting of cattle, hogs, sheep," and so forth. It continues:

But the fact that exports of products of the farm continue in such large quantities indicates that the price movement is due, not to the tariff, but to a world-wide movement upward in the prices of these commodities.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

But to emphasize its past deception and its present confession, it concludes:

The course of prices indicates plainly that the world is demanding our food supplies and that the prices have advanced here, not by reason of the tariff, but with the general upward movement.

[Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

My friends, the Democratic Party has for 25 years, in this Capitol, on the stump, through the press, denounced this farmers' product tariff as a fraud and a sham, put on and kept on by the Republicans for the purpose of fooling the farmers into voting the Republican ticket; and now when the Republican Party, through its President, through its senatorial report, and through its textbook, is ready to confess its guilt and admit that we have been right all the time, to my surprise and regret, we have a few Democrats here and at the other end of the Capitol who object to the Republicans making such admission and are trying to prevent them from doing it. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] And yet, in the face of that senatorial report, in the face of that Republican textbook, there are Republicans, insurgents and standpatters, who will have the audacity to stand here before us and on the stump before the people, and still insist that the farmer's prosperity depends upon a tariff on his wheat, corn, rye, barley, cattle, live stock, and other products. Stand where you may, that report, that textbook, will stare you in the face and condemn you of false pretense and deception. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is not honest, it is not right, for Republicans here or elsewhere to persist in the attempt to further humbug the American farmer.

Mr. Chairman, there is no reason why any American farmer should become alarmed over the enactment of this Canadian reciprocity agreement. To him it will prove a benefit. I call attention to one sweeping fact that ought to convince every intelligent man that the American farmer has nothing to lose but all to gain by this reciprocity. Canada buys from us annually five times more of agricultural products than we buy from her. In the last five years we have yearly, on the average, exported to Canada more than $20,000,000 worth of farm products, while she has exported to us less than, on the average, $4,000,000. In other words, Canada needs our farm products five times as much as we need hers. For the five years 1906 to 1910, inclusive, we exported to Canada $4,442,307 worth of wheat, while she exported to us only $776,239 worth; she bought from us over five times as much as we bought from her. Of corn, we exported in the five years to Canada $21,704,317 worth and imported less than $10,000; that is, she purchased of us more than 2,000 times more than she sold us. I have been unable to get the figures as to the barley trade between the two countries for the last five years. I have it only for 1910. For that year we sold to Canada $99,810 worth of barley and purchased only $1,221. Of cattle, we sold to her $1,578,179 worth and purchased $958,138; that is, we sold her over $600,000 more of cattle than she sold us. Of horses, we sold Canada $14,172,075 worth, while we purchased only $2,648,301, a balance in our favor of over $11,000,000. For apples, berries, and other fruits, vegetables, tobacco, cotton, peanuts, and other agricultural products Canada is our customer, notwithstanding the fact that she levies a tariff duty upon their importation. Reciprocity removes the tariff against our agricultural products and gives them free entrance into Canada. Why is Canada in favor of reciprocity with us? It is not to open a market for her surplus wheat or any of her surplus farm products. She has the same market for her surplus wheat and other surplus farm products as we have for ours; the same means as we have to get her products to the markets of the world. She ships her surplus to Liverpool and London. We ship our surplus to Liverpool and London, and both the exporters of the United States and of Canada get the same price in the same markets for the same products.

But Canada wants our market here for her other products, and these products the American public wishes to buy. She produces lumber, shingles, laths. The American farmer does not. She produces wood pulp and paper. The American farmer does not. She produces coal, copper, asbestos, nickel ore. The American farmer does not. Canada's great exports to us consist of lumber, shingles, laths, lumber and timber products, wood pulp, paper, copper, nickel ore, and other mineral products, fish, and chemicals, none of which our farmer produces, and many of which he must have. What Canada wants is a removal or lowering of our tariff walls against these products which her people wish to sell us, and the removal and lowering of her tariff walls against our products which her people wish to buy and which we wish to sell. She wants reciprocity and we want reciprocity, so that she can sell us these products, and with her increased sales from them buy from us more of our horses, cattle, grain, vegetables, fruits, cotton, tobacco, peanuts, and other agricultural and manufactured products, which she needs.

This measure gives the farmer of Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Kansas, the Dakotas, Nebraska, and other Western and border States cheaper lumber, cheaper shingles. It gives him cheaper wire for fencing. It gives him cheaper salt, cheaper wagons, and many other articles he must have. It is inconceivable to me how any Member on this floor, especially from the West, who claims to be the friend of the farmer, can fail to vote for this measure that provides some relief at least from the trusts who are yearly plundering the farmers. But in order to stand by the Lumber Trust and lumber kings, the Paper Trust, the Steel Trust, the Salt Trust, and all the trusts and special interests, on whose products the tariff is either removed or lowered by this bill, the Republicans, insurgents and standpatters alike, under the leadership of Mr. CANNON and Mr. DALZELL, are fighting this measure under the flimsy pretext and excuse that reciprocity will hurt the farmer. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. There are many on this side who are willing to vote to amend this treaty by placing every trust-made article upon the free list. Are you?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am in favor of placing these trust-made articles on the free list, and I am going to vote for it, and if you are honest and sincere about it we Democrats are going to give you, within the next few days, an opportunity to vote for such a bill, without amending and thereby jeopardizing this or any other good measure. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to the fact that, although we are unable to change a pact made by the two Governments, the Democratic Party have reported this bill to the House with a third section added, which invites the President of the United States to put every article on the free list between this country and Canada. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KITCHIN. Ah, our Republican friends are anxious about the free list, and those most anxious to get it now are those who heretofore have been most vigorously opposed to a free list. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I observe, too, that those who now seem most earnest for a free list for the farmer are the strongest opponents of this bill, and are trying the hardest to put something onto it which they hope will defeat both reciprocity and the free list, in the House or in the Senate. Let us see about the free list. I hold here the free-list bill which we have introduced. What do you want on the free list for the farmer? Do you want farm implements? All right, here they are, every kind and description. Do you want salt? Here it is. Do you want lumber, rough and dressed, shingles, laths, posts? Here they are. Do you want boots and shoes? Here they are. Do you want wagons and carts? Here they are. Do you want cotton bagging and ties and grain sacks? Here they are. What do you want on the free list that we are not going to give you an opportunity to vote for?

My friends, we will hear much during this debate about amending this reciprocity bill by placing on the free list something for the farmer and the laboring man, and many amendments will be offered by those opposed to the bill, not with a desire to better it, but to defeat it. The opponents will play the same game at this session that they did at the last when the reciprocity bill was pending. My good friend from Pennsylvania, Mr. DALZELL, the leader of the opposition forces then, as well as now, made a motion to recommit the bill, with instructions to add a long string of articles to the free list, including meat products, flour and other food products, farming implements, and so forth. I said to the House then that the Republicans were not sincere in demanding that meat products and other food products should be placed on the free list, because there had been bills introduced by Republicans pending before the Republican Ways and Means Committee for six months, putting flour, meat, and other food products on the free list, and that neither Mr. DALZELL nor any other Republican on that committee had voted to bring out any such bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I remind Republicans, and especially the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. DALZELL, that we have put in our free-list bill every single article that was contained in his motion to recommit. [Applause.] And I say to the gentleman that we are going to expose him when he votes against that free-list bill as the most consummate——

Several MEMBERS. State it.

Mr. KITCHIN. Lover of the farmer in the United States. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Pennsylvania is going to love the farmer so good that he is going to vote against everything that we have on the free list for the farmer. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. KITCHIN. Why, yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. If you have a bill containing the same items that are contained in the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to recommit, why did you vote against that motion?

Mr. KITCHIN. Because the motion was not made in sincerity. The gentleman from Pennsylvania knew and the gentleman from Minnesota knew that it was made to defeat reciprocity; knew it never could become a law with that in it. Both knew that reciprocity and the gentleman's free-list items would be defeated. Now, if you are in favor of removing the tariff on those articles, we are going to give an opportunity to test your sincerity. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Let me finish this question. You say that it was put on there insincerely for the purpose of defeating the treaty?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] was candid enough in his speech to say that it was done for that very purpose. I do not know whether a Republican will tell the truth about such matters; the gentleman knows better than I do. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Did the gentleman ever know of a tentative reciprocity treaty being changed by an amendment put on it?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, there is no use discussing anything of that sort.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I will assert from my knowledge that there never was one defeated. I wanted to say that I voted for the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania sincerely, and I shall vote for it again. [Applause.]

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman voted for it because he wanted to kill it.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. No, sir. I voted for it absolutely and sincerely.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am glad the gentleman is the only man that was fooled by the motion. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I voted for it in the interest of the consumers.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. JAMES. I want to show to the House how badly fooled the gentleman from Minnesota has been and has continued to be by the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] to amend the reciprocity treaty. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] had in that motion to amend placing articles on the free list, and among these items was fresh meats, which Canada had refused to accede to the United States and reciprocally place upon the free list, and the adoption of the Dalzell amendment would have absolutely killed the reciprocity bill, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not deny it.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. How does the gentleman know that?

Mr. JAMES. I have it from the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who told me that the President of the United States told him so.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It was rumor to that effect?

Mr. JAMES. No, sir; it is the word of the President of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I should question whether the President of the United States ever said it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state that I asked the President of the United States himself why it was not put on the free list, when cattle were put on the free list, and the President stated to me that he wanted to put meat on the free list, but the Canadian commissioners refused to do so. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I understood the President said this, and the public interviews showed that he was in favor of making absolute free trade between Canada and the United States, and they objected to that, but that he did not specifically deny or state that they objected to meat alone.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not talking about an interview; I am stating what the President of the United States said to me, and I will assure the gentleman that if he will go to the White House this afternoon the President will so state to him.

Mr. HILL. It is entirely fair to supplement the statement of the gentleman from Alabama that in making the reciprocity treaty Canada yielded on fresh meats seven times as much as the United States did in order to get together.

Mr. JAMES. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. JAMES. I want to ask if the gentleman from Minnesota will persist in the statement that he will again vote for the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL]?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. For the purpose of putting those items on the free list I will vote every time to put them on the free list, no matter in what form they appear.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I would regret to see any Democrat, in the face of Democratic policies, in the face of Democratic pledges to honestly revise the tariff downward, in the very teeth of a specific demand of the Democratic platform that the tariff on lumber, on wood pulp, on print paper should be removed, enroll himself among the opponents of this measure. It is in line with reciprocity policies, as I have shown you, which have been pursued and indorsed and advocated by Democrats for 50 years. It goes further. It incorporates in it, in part, the express declaration of the Democratic platform in favor of free print paper and free wood pulp and free lumber. I can not see how any Democrat can vote against it unless that Democrat wants to vote either for the Lumber Trust, the Salt Trust, the Farming Implement Trust, or the Wood Pulp and Print Paper Trust, or the Steel Trust, or the mica producer, on whose products the tariff is either removed or reduced in the interest of the American consumer.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I want to ask the gentleman if he is talking to that side of the House on the reciprocity measure or the measure that he is talking of introducing?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, if the gentleman has not intelligence enough to know what an intelligent gentleman is talking about, I can not take up time explaining to the gentleman. [Laughter.] I will have to refuse to yield further to the gentleman. I am going to quit you and let you take a second thought. [Laughter.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Well, I want to ask another question.

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, then, quick.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. In talking about that you ask them about free lumber. I want to say this does not put lumber on the free list.

Mr. KITCHIN. It puts rough lumber on the free list, and thus makes a reduction on every kind of lumber, whether rough or planed, of from $1 to $1.25 a thousand feet. Does not that help your farmers out in North Dakota?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am from Washington.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, you are from Washington! Oh, I see why the gentleman is against it. Washington! [Laughter.] The home of timber kings and lumber trusts! There are four men in the State of Washington who, with their companies, own more standing timber than there is pine timber in the whole 13 Southern States! Lumber trusts, lumber kings, from Washington; certainly; certainly! [Prolonged applause and laughter.]

Why, no wonder that a shrewd, smart Republican can fool a busy farmer when that gentleman over there came very nearly fooling me. [Laughter.] Why, he looked so sincere and so candid and so meek when he was talking about the tariff on the farmer's wheat that I really thought he was even fooled into the belief that a tariff helped the farmer, and now I see back behind him old man Weyerhaeuser, who and whose companies own more lumber than all of the standing timber in all of the Southern States. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota rose.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, please sit down. [Laughter.] Let me get through.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Does the gentleman refuse to yield for a question?

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me get through this——

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It is on North Carolina lumber.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, all right. Go ahead.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Did the gentleman have an opportunity to vote for free lumber during the enactment of the Payne-Aldrich bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and I voted for it.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. So did I.

Mr. KITCHIN. Two good patriots! [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. How about the balance of the North Carolina delegation?

Mr. KITCHIN. Well, boys, I am almost ashamed to say. [Prolonged laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. How about the 38 Members more on the Democratic side? How did they vote on free lumber?

Mr. KITCHIN. They voted mighty, mighty bad. [Laughter.] All right; now the gentleman is asking me a question, and let me ask some.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. And did they not defeat free lumber?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; with the aid of an almost solid vote on that side. I never have said that all Democrats were at all times and under all circumstances good patriots. [Laughter.] I have often said there are a few Democrats as bad sometimes as most Republicans are all the time. [Laughter.] Now, you ask me why a little minority of 38 Democrats (there were only 32, as I recall) voted against free lumber. Let me ask you, why did over 75 per cent of you Republicans over there vote against free lumber? More than 75 per cent of the Democrats voted squarely with the platform for the removal of the duty on lumber, and 75 per cent, yes, 85 per cent, of you Republicans voted with the Lumber Trust, the timber kings, to keep it on [applause on the Democratic side]; and yet you ask me how a little minority on our side voted.

Mr. Chairman, the proof that the tariff on agricultural products, which is removed by this bill, is a sham, is so clear and overwhelming that it will sweep the intelligent mind to conviction in spite of itself. We underrate the good sense and intelligence of the American farmer if we delude ourselves into the belief that we can vote against this bill in the interest of the timber kings, the Paper Trust, Steel Trust, and other trusts, and then plead to him the excuse that we did so because it removed, as to Canada, the tariff on his products. He knows that such a tariff is a fake. He knows that it does not and can not affect the price of his products. He knows that each year his products go out into the markets of the world in competition with the world, and the price at home and abroad is fixed by the world's market. He knows that what he needs is not the retention of a fake tariff on what he sells, but a removal or reduction of the real tariff on what he buys. He knows, or will find out, that this bill, among other things, puts salt, rough lumber, barbed wire and other wire for fencing on the free list; that it reduces the tariff on cutlery from over 70 per cent to 27½ per cent; on scissors and shears and knives and forks from over 50 per cent to 27½ per cent; on clocks and watches from over 40 per cent to 27½ per cent. He knows, or will find out, that it reduces the tariff on farm wagons from 35 per cent to 22 per cent; on feed cutters, crushers, field rollers and manure spreaders from 45 per cent to 20 per cent; that it reduces the tariff on shingles, laths, and many other articles which he must buy.

He knows, or will find out, that because of this removal or reduction of the tariff on these articles the Lumber Trust and timber syndicates of the West, the Salt Trust, the Steel Trust, the Farming Implement Trust, the Watch Trust, and all the other trusts whose articles are reduced are "raising heaven and earth" to defeat this bill. He knows that those on this floor who have heretofore been supposed to be the most friendly to the trusts and the special interests are the most vigorous opponents of this measure. When you vote against this bill and go back to your district, the farmer, whom you hope to delude, will be the first to ask, Why did you vote in the interest of the Salt Trust against removal of the tax on salt? He will ask you, Why did you vote in the interest of the Lumber Trust and timber syndicates against putting rough lumber on the free list and against reducing the tax on shingles and laths? What are you going to tell him? He is going to ask you, Why did you vote with the Steel Trust and other Representatives on this floor against putting barbed wire and other wire for fencing on the free list and against a reduction of the tax on cutlery, scissors and shears, and knives and forks? What answer will you, what answer can you, give? He will want to know why you voted with the Watch Trust against the reduction of the tariff tax on watches and clocks. He is certainly going to ask you why you voted in the interest of the Farming Implement Trust against a reduction of the tax on wagons, feed cutters, grain crushers, field rollers, and manure spreaders? What will be your answer? Are you going to have the cheek to put up the old, stale, fake plea of a "tariff on the farmer's products"? Are you going to discredit his intelligence by trying to fool him again about a tariff on wheat, corn, rye, cattle, and so forth? Why, gentlemen, he will laugh in your face. The trusts and special interests must furnish you a better plea.

There is another gentleman in your district who is interested in this bill and who is going to ask you some questions. The laboring man knows that this bill puts fish on the free list; that it reduces the tax on flour from—at the present prices—$1.15 per barrel to 50 cents per barrel; that it reduces the tax on bacon and hams from 4 cents to 1½ cents per pound, on shoulders, sides, salted pork, and beef and dried and smoked meats from 25 per cent to 1½ cents per pound; that it removes the tax on butter and cheese. He knows, or will find out, that the big flour mills, the Meat Trust, and the Elgin Butter Trust are bitterly fighting this bill. He is going to ask you why you voted in the interest of the big flour mills against a reduction of the tax on flour. Why did you vote against giving the laboring man and his family untaxed fish, untaxed butter, and cheese? He is certainly going to make you tell him why, in opposing the reduction of the outrageous tax on meat and beef in these hungry days of the high cost of living, you saw fit to vote in favor of the Meat Trust, the huge Armour-Swift-Morris combine, and against the laboring man and his wife and children. What are you going to say to him? You can not put up to him the bogus excuse of the "farmers' tariff." The Meat Trust will have to hunt for you a better plea to satisfy him.

Still another gentleman in your district will have some questions to put to you. The editor of the country weekly paper, as well as the city daily, knows that this bill puts on the free list print paper; that it loosens the grip which the International Paper Co., known as the Paper Trust, has on the throats of the tens of thousands of newspaper owners throughout the country. He is going to ask you why you voted in the interest of the Paper Trust against removing the tax on print paper. And if you are a Democrat, he is going to read to you the Democratic platform, which demanded the "immediate repeal of the tariff on print paper."

My friends, the humor of some of the opponents of this bill, both on this side of the Chamber as well as on that, is most delightful. They say that they oppose it because it is in the interest of the trusts and the protected manufacturers. It seems never to have occurred to them that if this bill is in the interest of the trusts and manufacturers that the ex-Speaker [Mr. CANNON], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], instead of leading the opposition, would be the strongest advocates of this measure in this body. And they say that Canada does not ship to us any wire fencing or cutlery or wagons or meat products or other manufactured articles. But why? Because our tariff wall is too high. This bill proposes to lower it. The manufacturers and trusts are fighting it. The Armour-Swift-Morris combine know that with the Canadian tariff on our hogs, cattle, and other live stock removed, and our tariff on beef and meat products removed or reduced, that English and Canadian capital will establish in Canada larger meat-packing plants, and these will compete in the American market with the Meat Trust in purchasing the farmer's cattle, hogs, and other live stock, and will compete also with the trust in selling to the American consumer meat products, and thus the live-stock grower will have another competing buyer and the American consumer will have another competing seller of meat products. So it will be with wire fencing, cutlery, farm wagons, and other articles whose tariff is reduced by this bill. The trusts in the United States fear, with a reduced tariff on their products, the establishment by Canadian and English capital and, perhaps American capital, of competing plants across the line in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, we know that the positive, organized opposition against reciprocity is not the American farmer, but the American protected monopolist. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Every Democrat and every Republican on this floor knows that the two great organizing forces behind the opposition are the International Paper Co., known as the Paper Trust, that controls 80 per cent of all the paper used throughout the length and breadth of this country from the big metropolitan daily to the smallest country weekly, and the Lumber Trust and timber kings of the West, who own and control over 80 per cent of the standing timber of the United States. They have organized the protected forces against it, and, pretending great anxiety for the agricultural interests, have had the shrewdness to play upon the fears and to alarm some of the farmers against it.

My friend from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] came near fooling this whole House in the belief that he was anxious about the farmer, and then we happened to find out about those old lumber kings out there in Washington.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. KITCHIN. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would like to ask you what I said or what led you to believe that I was speaking in favor of the lumbermen?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, the lumbermen, who have a real keen and shrewd advocate on this floor, will not let him talk lumber. He must talk wheat and vote lumber. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Do you decline to answer my question?

Mr. KITCHIN. You would be the most foolish representative of the Lumber Trust in the world if you would stand here on the floor and say, "I represent the Lumber Trust in the West." Oh, no. In order for the trust to get some votes against reciprocity, you have got to be for the farmer. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will promise you this, that I will vote for free lumber if you will vote for free sugar on any bill that you put in.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will vote for both when the time comes, and you will vote for neither. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, let me remind opponents of this bill, who have deceived themselves into the belief that a sufficient excuse to their rural constituents is the assertion that it is in the interest of the American protected manufacturers, that the American Protective Tariff League, the lobbying organization of the manufacturers and trusts, does not take the same view. There are no smarter fellows than the members of this league. They know what they want. They know whether this bill will help or hurt the protected interests. They are waging a most active and vigorous campaign against it.

Let me read from an Indiana paper, the Daily Sun:

> We have received a package of postal cards from the American Protective Tariff League, accompanied by the request that they be handed to voters who will fill out the blanks and mail them to Members of Congress. On the back of the card is a request that we "cooperate and help defeat the Canadian reciprocity bill."

I have here one of the postal cards referred to in this paper, sent out by the league to a voter and by the voter to his Representative. The league is playing the same old game of fooling the farmer. It recognizes the fact, as Republicans here do, that unless the American farmers can be kept deluded as to protection on his products the manufacturers and trusts can not hope to get his vote for protection to them.

Let me read two of the several "whereases" on the address side of the card:

> Whereas, in our judgment, the Canadian reciprocity agreement is a gross violation of the policy of protection, in that it unfairly sacrifices the interests of American agriculture.

How anxious and how alarmed are these organized plunderers of the farmer over the "sacrificing of the interests of American agriculture" by this bill!

But the next "whereas" exposes the grounds for such anxiety and alarm:

> Whereas the manufacturer can not hope to retain protection for his industry when protection shall have been denied to the farmer.

We must fool the farmer; we must make him believe that this scheme of tariff robbery embraces his interest as well as ours. He must save for us the right to plunder, by this scheme, the American farmer and the American people.

Now let me read the "resolve" of the league:

> Resolved, That the American Protective Tariff League is unalterably opposed to the adoption of the Canadian tariff agreement, and urges that all friends of protection bring to bear every proper influence upon the Congress of the United States against the adoption of said agreement.

In the face of that resolution of the American Protective Tariff League, what Democrat or Republican will have the audacity, here or at home, to offer as an excuse for voting against this bill that it was in the interest of the trusts and manufacturers? Gentlemen, if I had made no investigation of the subject, after seeing that resolution and knowing the bitter opposition of the American Protective Tariff League to the bill, I would have felt it, not only my duty as a Democrat, but my duty as an honest, patriotic citizen, to vote for this reciprocity bill and against the demands of the American Protective Tariff League. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer apologies for consuming so much time. If, however, my good Republican friends had not interrupted me so often, I would have finished long ago. Before concluding, I wish to express regret that it became necessary in this debate—a necessity anticipated because of the character of the discussion at the last session and the minority report of the Republicans—in advocating reciprocity with Canada by which freer intercourse between the two peoples should be established, to descend to the low level of bushels, and pounds, and yards and feet, and dollars and cents.

But in the minority report and in the speeches last session of the opposition they gave notice of the ground upon which they would give battle, and that impelled me to meet and refute their sordid arguments. I wish in this debate we could raise the question to a broader and higher and more patriotic plane. There is no more reason why a tariff wall should be maintained between this country and Canada, stretching 3,000 miles, than there should be between the State of Pennsylvania and the State of New York. The people of Canada are our people. We are of the same blood. We have the same ancestry. Hundreds of thousands of American citizens have crossed the line and made homes there. They have our institutions. They have our aspirations; they have our inspirations. They have the same thrift and industry. We allow them to cross any part of the 3,000 miles of the imaginary dividing line with their wives and children and friends; foreigner or native, they come or go anywhere in America; but just as soon as one of them takes a chicken, a horse, a bushel of wheat, any property the product of the mine, the farm, or the factory, the law steps in and penalizes him—taxes his people and our people. This is a cruel injustice and wrong to both people, which this bill partly remedies. When we bind together that country with this, not with the cords of entangling treaties and alliances, but with the stronger ties of mutual intercourse and commerce, we form a bond of such strength that human power can not break it asunder. I want the comradeship and love and peace of Canada for our people. They want and need ours. When we have joined these two together in bonds of commercial interest and intercourse—and I hope this will lead to absolute free trade between the two countries—then in the future, when our peace, our happiness, our safety, our commerce are threatened, as in the days of the Revolution there came up from South Carolina the cry, "The cause of Boston is the cause of all," so there will come up from every Canadian throat, from Columbia to Quebec, "The cause of the United States is the cause of all." She will realize that what affects our peace will affect her peace; what will affect our commerce will affect her commerce; what will affect our safety will affect her safety. Every instinct of self-preservation, every sentiment of peace, of prosperity, and of happiness will impel her sympathies and her good offices to our side.

Mr. Chairman, as I said in the beginning, this is only a step in the right direction, but still a step. I trust that when the vote is taken every Democrat on this side, for the good of his party and his country, will fall into ranks, and that we will take that step all together in one solid phalanx. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] consume some of his time?

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, how much time has been consumed by that side?

The CHAIRMAN. Three hours, exactly.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield one hour to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine is recognized for one hour.

Mr. HINDS. Mr. Chairman, before I begin the few remarks I shall have to make, I ask permission that I may revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD. A portion of what I have to present will be somewhat technical in argument, containing some statistics, with which I would not weary the House. Therefore I ask that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD at their conclusion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. JAMES. I shall not object to that, Mr. Chairman. I think that permission ought to be granted to all Members of the House; but some gentleman here this morning interposed an objection. I am not going to object to the right being extended to the gentleman from Maine, but I think it ought to be extended to every one who wants it, on both sides of the Chamber.

Mr. HINDS. I will cooperate with the gentleman to secure that privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. HINDS. Mr. Chairman, I can not remove from my mind the firm conviction that the policy proposed in this bill is of an importance out of all proportion to the scantiness of the investigation which has preceded it. The farmers of this Nation are more than a third of its people, and whatsoever affects the basis of their industries affects all. I know how hard it is to bring the realization of this fact home to those who dwell in great cities, especially to those who control stupendous industrial and commercial interests, besides which a farm of 150 acres seems an inconsiderable enterprise. Even the great intellect of Horace Greeley succumbed to the prevailing delusion, if we may credit the statement of the brilliant eulogist of Lincoln who said that Horace Greeley thought himself a bigger man than Abraham Lincoln because he lived in a bigger town. But I am convinced that if the dwellers in cities will look below the surface of this question they will see that it does not concern the farmer alone. If in what I am to say I shall seem to speak of him entirely, it is because his industry is at the foundation of our prosperity, and in speaking of him I speak of all. The dwellers in cities can not disassociate their interest from that of the farmers. Diminish the purchasing power of the American farmer and you diminish by so much the prosperity of every city and of every laborer, clerk, merchant, and banker within its limits.

A hundred and twenty-five years ago, when our fathers were first agitating the question of a tariff, the New York Chamber of Commerce reminded the opposing farmers that agriculture could not flourish without commerce. To-day the merchant and manufacturer may well be reminded that commerce and manufactures are not likely to flourish without a successful agriculture.

THE QUESTION TO BE ARGUED ON BROAD NATIONAL GROUNDS.

The question is too great and important to be argued on anything but broad national grounds. Grievously as this bill affects industries of the State of Maine, I am not here to argue that it affects Maine more than it affects every other State in the North or in the South, in the East or in the West. In Maine we see more clearly because we are nearer the conditions, but if the gentlemen of the Democratic Party succeed in carrying this bill through this House and this Congress, its ultimate effects on the economic and social life of this Nation must be such that Maine will be neither the loudest nor the most inconsolable in her lamentations.

I do not mean to say by this that the challenges which are ringing out from the States bordering on Canada are to be disregarded. When the sentries on the picket line begin to challenge and fire it behooves the whole army to take notice.

BURDENS AND BENEFITS NOT JUSTLY APPORTIONED.

The manner in which this bill distributes its supposed benefits and its undoubted hardships violates mankind's fundamental idea of justice and equity. Since the dawn of time, through all mythologies and religions, man has expressed his inborn idea that to those who have the suffering and self-denial should come the bliss of the better world, the peace of the Elysian fields, the joy of the golden streets. That is real reciprocity. But this bill introduces into that ancient, instinctive idea of equity, a new principle; that one class of citizens is to have the sacrifices, while another class enjoys the rewards. The dairymen of New York and Ohio are to tread the earthly pathway of self-denial, and in reward the makers of barbed-wire fencing are to roam the Elysian fields [laughter]; the wheat farmers of the Dakotas are to keep the long vigil of unrestricted competition, and in return the automobile makers of Detroit are to speed over the streets of gold; the fishermen of Gloucester who keep watch and watch with death on the banks of Newfoundland are to surrender their market, and in return the Connecticut clock makers are to set up their timepieces in the realms of bliss, where a thousand years are but as a day; the potato farmer of Maine or Michigan is to have the troubles of Lazarus, but the maker of harvesting machines is to rest his head on the bosom of Abraham. [Laughter and applause.] One class sows that another may reap, and you call it reciprocity.

Names count for much with us, and the names of Blaine and McKinley are being used to commend this proposition. There is no warrant for this. In his youth in 1864, as a Member of this House, Mr. Blaine voted to repeal an arrangement with Canada far better than the one proposed now, since it gave free coal, which this does not. And in his later days Mr.

Blaine in his Twenty Years of Congress referred to that reciprocity as "one-sided, vexatious, and unprofitable." Mr. McKinley made the very tariff duties which you are now trying to sweep away; and, like Mr. Blaine, never favored reciprocity in competing products.

FREE TRADE IN FARM PRODUCTS REVERSES THE POLICY OF A CENTURY.

The broad proposition which is before us is that tariff duties levied on our borders against commodities produced by foreign people, be swept away, so far as the principal and practically the only competitors of our farmers are affected. We are giving the farmer free trade and are pleading in justification that it will not hurt him and will help the consumer. If these two pleas are consistent and truthful, well and good. If either or both be fallacious, we must know it.

One significant fact may arouse in our minds a suspicion that we are wrong in removing the protection from the farmer's products. Protection for the farmer is an old national policy coeval with the Constitution itself. In 1789 living was simple. There were not many food products of the farm that could be imported. Potatoes were raised abroad only in limited quantities. The peasantry of France still believed them poisonous. The bread eaten by the American people was principally made of Indian corn, wheaten bread appearing on the table only when the minister came. But there was one foreign article that could compete in our markets—cheese. And the statesmen of 1789 put a duty of 4 cents a pound on cheese. For a hundred and twenty-five years, with few intervals, there has been a tariff on cheese, usually 4 cents a pound, in 1816 as high as 9 cents. Under the Democratic Wilson tariff it was 4 cents, to-day it is 6 cents. Our fathers made it 4 cents when the nearest competition was 3,000 miles away, over an ocean. Freight ran into dollars and weeks. To-day our tariff on cheese is only 6 cents a pound, and one of the great cheese-making countries of the world is separated from our markets only by a few cents and a few hours.

You propose to reverse the policy of a hundred and twenty-five years and give us, not lower duties, but free trade with our only competitor, not only in cheese, but in all the principal farm products. Many of us have hoped for a reasonable, symmetrical tariff on manufactured goods founded on scientifically acquired information. How can that ever be if we are to proceed against the farmer with this crude violence?

LONG ESTABLISHED POLICY SHOULD BE REVERSED ONLY AFTER CAREFUL EXAMINATION.

I am not one of those who believe that a policy should always continue because it has continued a century and a quarter. Because butter, wheat, oats, and potatoes were protected in 1824 is not in itself a reason why they should be protected now. Because even the Democratic tariff makers in 1857 and again in 1894 considered it wise to give the farmers a substantial protection is not a compelling reason to constrain our acts here and now. But when wise men and partially wise men in certain situations have at different times reasoned out the same line of action, what they have done has attained great authority and dignity. Statesmen and jurists have used their acts as the mariner uses the lighthouse. They have been disregarded only after the fullest investigation and the most mature deliberation.

To-day and here, however, we are brushing aside the experience of our past. We are disregarding the progressive and enlightened conclusions of statesmanship in Germany, France, and England and are doing this great thing without investigation worthy the name.

One night the States-General of France voted a king off the throne and changed the order of society. That stands as the great precedent of precipitate legislative action. But the people of France had read, studied, and pondered for nearly 10 years the Red Book of Necker, wherein the greatest finance minister of the age had set forth the state of the nation. You are proposing to-day a great new policy that goes to the very social fabric of America, and where is the great committee of this House that has probed to the bottom of it, and where is the book that has spread its investigations before the American people?

THE NECESSITY OF ACCURATE REASONING ON THIS QUESTION.

To many this thing seems simple. Because Canada has New-World conditions which, generally speaking, are like our own, therefore there can be no harm in letting her agricultural products compete in our markets. That seems plausible, and it has the ear of the American people to-day, because we have always thought of tariffs as applying chiefly to manufactures. But right here let us stop and examine, for here is the fork of the road.

It was my good fortune once to hear from the gallery of the English House of Commons a debate on the management of English railways. And one plausible orator, with much confidence of assertion, declared that statistics showed the loss of life to be far greater on American roads than on English. From this he deduced conclusions unfavorable to American skill and capacity. But a member from the Government bench answered him; I do not know the name or the rank of that modest, well-poised gentleman. I have no doubt he had been trained in one of those two great universities where the scholars of England—greater than her Wellingtons and her Nelsons—have for a thousand years taught the youth of England to search for and know the truth. Taking up the statements so detrimental to the United States, so flattering to English pride, he admitted that the statistics did show a greater loss of life on American railroads, but he pointed out that America was a very great country; that many thousand miles of her road had been extended hastily in sparsely populated regions. It was to be expected that there would be great loss of life on such roads. But in the older settled East, where fixed conditions prevailed, the loss of life was so little as to show that American skill and capacity were not to be compared unfavorably with English. I do not recount this narrative to read any lesson to the brilliant and discriminating intellects in this Hall. I do it merely for the sake of the argument I am about to make, to arrest your attention, especially the attention of the Democratic majority before it pushes home this blow at the prosperity of the farmer and the social life of the Nation.

GREAT DISTINCTION BETWEEN THE FARM HOME AND THE FACTORY.

The fact that Canada has New-World conditions, that her labor is not crushed down as in the older countries, furnishes, I will admit, a fair argument that you might with safety remove the duties on manufactured goods in the future when conditions of labor shall have equalized. The argument, then, may some day be sound when applied to factories. Is it sound when applied to farms?

No; and for this reason, that the farm is primarily not a factory, but a home.

Capitalists gather up money, build mills, call in laborers, and turn out product for the main purpose of paying dividends on the capital they have gathered up.

The farmer acquires land that he may found a home.

It is not the lack of bricks, machinery, or factory sites that checks the expansion of factories, but the disappearance of dividends.

The expansion of farms ceases only when there is no more land under the western sun.

Dividends are the fundamental conditions of manufactures.

Areas of land for homes are the fundamental condition of agriculture.

If the factory's product falls in price below the dividend-producing line, the factory shuts down to wait for better times. The building of new factories is discouraged.

Did any of you gentlemen ever hear of the farms shutting down as factories shut down because the bottom fell out of the market for their products? We heard that the farmers of Kansas once burned their corn when they could not sell it. But farming went on, because the homes could not stop.

When cotton goods fall in the market, the cotton mills curtail production and save loss by running fewer weeks in the year.

When the farmer's products fall in the market, he must produce not less but more, because the expense of the home must be met.

Manufactures, organized by trusts and gentlemen's agreements, easily control output and prevent overproduction.

Farmers, by the necessities of their condition, are controlled in their production only by the Almighty's dispensation of sunshine and rain.

The farm is evidently to be distinguished from the factory. And may we not make a blunder—a great blunder such as Napoleon said was worse than a crime—if in our reasoning here we apply to the agricultural schedule of our tariff the same formulas that we apply to the manufacturing schedule? [Applause on the Republican side.]

At this point let us guard against a confusion of thought. I am not trying to show that farming creates homes and manufacturing does not. But in manufacturing the homes are the incident, not the object. A corporation with a thousand employees curtails production without responsibility as to its effect on the families of those employees. The human-life necessities do not impel an overproduction disastrous to the market. But when we turn to agriculture, the human-life necessities do that very thing. It is because of this that we must vary our accustomed formulas if we would not work a fearful havoc when we deal with the agricultural schedule.

INDEPENDENCE OF THE FARM HOME AND ITS RELATION TO MANUFACTURES.

A century ago the farm home was more preeminently the unit of civilization than to-day. It was almost independent within itself. The father and sons tilled the fields, cared for the cattle, and especially the sheep, while the mother and daughters kept the house and spun and wove the clothing. The daughters were the spinsters, and to this day an unmarried woman, whether she dwell in humble cottage or princely castle, is a spinster—living monument of the old independence of the farm home. In process of time the factory has taken over the family industries, as well as most of the village trades. The farmer and his family devote themselves to the simpler products, the raw materials; and after their own food supply is secure, must sell enough surplus to pay for the manufactured goods, professional services, and so forth, which are needed to satisfy their wants and tastes. It is obvious that if all in the world were farmers, there would be no people to buy the surplus. It is evident, then, that there must be other people, not engaged in farming, to buy and consume this surplus of the farmer, else he will be unable to purchase manufactured articles. It seems most consistent with reason that these other people who are to purchase the farmer's surplus should be his own neighbors, or, at least, of his own Nation or region, and especially those of his neighbors who are engaged in manufacturing the very articles which he needs to buy. And it is evident that both farmers and artisans will be most prosperous and the happiest when there are enough farmers to take the artisan's goods at a fair price, and enough artisans, professional men, and so forth, to take the farmer's surplus at a fair price.

EQUILIBRIUM BETWEEN AGRICULTURE AND MANUFACTURES.

This brings us to the question of proportion, or equilibrium, of manufactured and agricultural products. And it is right here on this point that the whole situation likely to be created by this reciprocity treaty develops itself. Our manufactures, syndicated as they are by trusts and associations, are easily controllable and do not tend to run into an overproduction, disastrous to profits on capital or the wages of labor. But the farms, being an aggregation of homes, disorganized, and each impelled by its own necessities, tend constantly to overproduce. And this overproduction becomes disastrous unless the limitation of acreage possible to be cultivated intervenes to prevent. Therefore the element of prime importance in this discussion is the relation of acreage to the capacity of the home market furnished by the nonagricultural classes.

Of this doctrine of the equilibrium of the home market we have heard little among English-speaking peoples, because England hopelessly destroyed the equilibrium of her home market when, as a result of the stimulation of the Napoleonic wars, she got more people into manufacturing than her acres, in the opinion of a dominating school of her statesmen, could possibly feed, even under the highest development of her agriculture. Then she felt forced to open her markets to the agricultural products of the world. We, who found our market in her necessities, have not examined her situation. But England herself is awakening, and in 1906, after exhaustive investigations, her tariff commission made a significant report. There has been, that report says—a broad contrast between the policy adopted by foreign countries and that adopted by the United Kingdom. Generally speaking, all foreign and European countries accept as the basis of their economic policy the necessity for maintaining a flourishing agriculture. This is partly due to economic reasons, partly to considerations of national defense and security. The result, speaking generally, is that these countries, instead of pursuing an exclusively manufacturing or an exclusively agrarian policy, have endeavored to maintain a balance between agriculture and manufactures.

"A balance between agriculture and manufactures!" Have any of us studied it before plunging into this great departure from the pathway traced by the instincts of our statesmen for a century and a quarter?

RELATION OF THE EQUILIBRIUM TO NATIONAL POWER AND SOCIAL LIFE.

"Consideration of national defense and security!" Have any of us studied the relations of agriculture to that great subject? We have thought of battleships and forts and have registered our thoughts in billion-dollar marks.

Have we forgotten that the farm home is the greatest nursery of men and women that a nation has? When Bismarck turned from free trade to protection and established Germany's agricultural duties, he did it on the ground of the salvation of the Prussian State and the German Empire. [Applause on the Republican side.] Wealth and factories are great assets of a nation, I grant you. I hope we and our neighbors will always have an abundance of both; but if we look over the history of our race in the parent country for the long course of time the word that comes oftenest from the pens of historians and the tongues of orators is not "wealth" or "factories," but "yeomanry." From Crecy to the Crimea, and on to this day, the yeomanry of England have been her proudest boast. And when the statesmen who but recently formed England's tariff commission came to examine the condition of the realm one of their most striking recommendations was a duty on agricultural products as an important means of encouraging small farmers—men of the yeomanry class.

Do you remember what the Boer War revealed to England? That her military recruits were undersized and that their vitality was lowered by the conditions of crowded city life. Well may her statesmen have turned their eyes backward to those stalwart farmer boys, the yeoman archers of England, who laid low the mailed chivalry of France, or those other country boys, stalwart in form and stern of conscience, whose valor at Dunbar and Worcester commended their leader to immortal fame and their model of organization to English-speaking soldiers for 250 years. And so the English statesmen—bethinking themselves of valor as well as of trade—recommended a tariff on agricultural products. [Applause on the Republican side.]

That is what English statesmen recommended after investigation and study. What you propose to do here and now is to tear down American agricultural duties after neither investigation nor study. [Applause on the Republican side.]

HOW THE EQUILIBRIUM OF THE FARMERS' MARKET WAS LOST.

Since other nations have thought it worth while to study the equilibrium of the farmers' market, it may be worth our time to halt for a moment the speedy onward course of this bill and reflect on it ourselves. It concerns all, the proudest city and the smallest town. It overrides all consideration of special profits or losses that we may think we see in this agreement.

Up to 1850 this equilibrium between agriculture and the home market was maintained the world over, because transportation was still costly on land and sea, and agricultural products, being bulky, were restrained by the cost of freight from flooding any particular market. But from 1850 onward the application of steam to land and water transportation revolutionized the economic condition of the world, and soon brought to the front one great and all-controlling economic phenomenon—the opening of the broad and fertile prairies of the western United States.

Farm products began to fly through space and hurl themselves upon far-distant places in unheard-of quantities. This was especially so with farm products raised on new lands, under the stimulus of nature's stored-up fertility. In 1878 the fast-freight and refrigerator car came into activity, and the dairyman of the West was constructively moved up to the door of the eastern farmer, and the two went merrily to work to make one another poor with overcompetition. The equilibrium of the market between the farmer's surplus and the artisan's product, from being constant and sure, under the eyes of all, became a flighty and inconstant thing, doing unexpected acts in response to distant voices. That a German farmer on the sands of Brandenburg should find the conditions in the little market town where his fathers had resorted for three centuries turned upside down by some farmers on a River Platte in a land called Nebraska, thousands of miles distant under the westward sun, was a phenomenon astounding and portentous. Well may it have driven Bismarck, imbued with the free-trade theories of the universities and sharing the prejudices of the country squires of Germany against manufactures, from the free-trade to the protection camp. [Applause on the Republican side.]

EFFECTS OF THE DISTURBANCE OF THE AMERICAN FARMERS' MARKET, ESPECIALLY IN NEW ENGLAND.

The markets of four great communities afford us an instructive lesson as to the effects of this phenomenon: The eastern United States, England, Germany, and France. Eastern United States, North and South, being in the same Nation with the new lands, met the flood of cheap products under free-trade conditions as it fell with full force in the years between 1870 and 1890. Many men in this Hall remember the dearth it produced. The Tariff Board in its brief contribution to this subject refers to it. If, in illustrating it, I refer to New England, it is only because I am most familiar with that region.

In New England this destruction of his markets brought the farmer a great revolution and a long dearth. The measure of that dearth is found in the values of farms and farm buildings in those six States. When agriculture has a fair chance, farm values ought to increase. The accumulations of industry ought to result in permanent improvements, the betterment of buildings, the fertilization of the land. What was the case? The total value of the farm realty of New England in 1890 was very little more than it had been in 1860, 30 years before. In those 30 years that splendid race of farmers practically stood still, and $20,000,000 measures the only increase in the value of their property. From 1890 to 1900 the increase was nearly $40,000,000, and from 1900 to 1910, when the equilibrium of markets was restored, the increase was over $170,000,000. [Applause on the Republican side.] I dwell on this feature of the equilibrium of markets because the percentage of this increase bears a striking resemblance to that between 1850 and 1860, when the old equilibrium existed.

The following table, prepared by the Census Bureau, tells as eloquently as columns of figures can the story of the long dearth on New England farms and the long halt of 30 years:

Average value of land, buildings, and other improvements per farm for each State from 1850 to 1910.

Year.	Total.	Maine.	New Hampshire.	Vermont.	Massachusetts.	Rhode Island.	Connecticut.
1910	$3,708	$2,659	$3,176	$3,442	$5,238	$5,287	$5,166
1900	2,753	1,628	2,392	2,510	4,189	4,206	3,616
1890	2,579	1,590	2,270	2,473	3,710	3,977	3,609
1880	2,802	1,591	2,367	3,078	3,806	4,164	3,957
1870 [1]	3,240	1,722	2,719	4,120	4,393	4,019	4,871
1860	2,589	1,413	2,285	2,980	3,462	3,616	3,607
1850	2,222	1,173	1,181	2,129	3,202	3,170	3,240

THE DEARTH NOT PECULIAR TO NEW ENGLAND.

While the effects of the long dearth were more pronounced in New England, perhaps, than elsewhere, yet in the whole North Atlantic Division, which includes New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, as well as New England, in 30 years, from 1860 to 1890, the value of farms and farm buildings increased only two-thirds as much as it had in the single decade from 1850 to 1860 under normal markets. This North Atlantic Division of the United States shows the effect of the opening of new lands on the old lands, as no other section of the United States could do at this time. With the best home market in America in their midst, with the much-vaunted world's market of Europe nearer to them than to any other farmers on this Continent, with the inherited appliances and improvements belonging to established countries, the farmers of the North Atlantic States could barely hold their own for 30 years. The West was the new and growing region; she will figure as an old and settled country in the new influx. So also will the South, which then did not notice, amid the ravages of war, the minor ravages of competition.

Our Tariff Board, in its meager report on this vast subject—meager because in the hot haste with which this House is moving there is no time for the scientific examination which I believe Mr. Emery and his associates would make so well—comments on one fact which it has found, but on the vast significance of which it has had no time to dwell. It says of the most flourishing Canadian Province—Ontario:

Ontario, while reporting the highest Canadian land value, shows the lowest Canadian rate of increase. It is worthy of note that Ontario is feeling the competition of western Canada, just as some years ago the eastern part of the United States felt the competition of our western lands.

The farmers of Ontario are already losing the equilibrium of their markets. All eastern Canada will soon be in the throes of it. And we are now proposing to tear down our ancient dikes and invite the flood to roll over us. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The New England farmer saved himself by courage and intelligence. The census shows that of the 12,000,000 acres of improved land in the six States in 1860, only 7,000,000 acres remain improved. But the officials of the Census Bureau advise me that a difference in methods of classification of improved land accounts for much of the difference. Yet, undoubtedly, there has been some decline. Take as an example, and not an extreme example, the State of Maine. "The acreage of improved land increased steadily until 1880," says the census report, "when a marked decline began, and in 1900 the percentage of farm land improved was smaller than ever before reported." And the Director of the Census went on to specify as one of the causes of this "the competition of western lands in cereal production."

After an agonizing struggle the New England farmer moved to a new base. He ceased to raise beef and sheep, he went out of wheat and the cereals, and became a dairyman, a grower of fruits, and a market gardener. He lessened his acreage, but kept in the business, for the farm is a home and is hostage of fate for the farmer in bad as well as good times. And to-day the census of 1910 shows that there are over 3,000 more farms in New England than there were in 1860. On a new basis that splendid race of farmers are reversing the decadence of two generations. And just in the hour of victory the statesmen of America, without scientific investigation, with hardly a hearing that deserves the name, propose to turn loose on them the competition of a new empire. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Can not the gentlemen on the Democratic side of this House see how futile a plan it is to bring on the American farmer the destruction of equilibrium in his markets and then expect to recompense him by lowering the duties on a few of the things he buys? You bring upon him a colossal calamity and then propose to salve his wounds with commercial percentages. You destroy his business and then pretend to cheapen the tools with which he carries it on. [Applause on the Republican side.]

SIMILAR EFFECTS IN THE ENGLISH FARMER'S MARKET.

England also met the deluge under free-trade conditions. What happened is succinctly stated by Mr. James J. Hill in his new work, Highways of Progress:

Agriculture in England—

He says—

has suffered in the last 25 years by the opening of new land in America and the cheapening of the world's transportation.

The English tariff commission gives in 1906 the same report:

The causes of the decline in agriculture are world-wide in their operation, affecting all importing countries. The striking feature in the case of the United Kingdom is that agriculture has been more depressed than in any other country and more depressed than any other branch of economic activity. During the last 25 years the course of all agricultural prices has been the same downward direction, with the result that agriculture has been subject to a great combination of causes, all tending toward its depression.

And, most significant of all, that commission goes on to say:

European countries generally have pursued a policy involving import duties on agricultural produce, whereas in the United Kingdom agriculturists have been subject to the unrestricted importation of foreign produce on terms not dissimilar, in many cases, from those experienced by manufacturers who complain of dumping.

These dry official statements give little of the tragedy of England's position. Forty thousand of her acres went out of culture last year. In the county of Buckingham farms sell as low as $63 an acre.

Buckingham County is about 30 miles from London and halfway between London and Birmingham. Many railroads connect it with both those cities. London is that great world's market that is dangled so temptingly before our farmers when some one wants to trade shadow for substance with them. London is the great capital of want and misery. The rise and fall of her tide of paupers is recorded in the journals as we record the prospects of a wheat crop. They are a host greater than the men who held with Meade the heights over Gettysburg. How could it be otherwise when the virgin soil of New Zealand and Canada can put out of business farmers within 30 miles of the world's market?

Dairy and grazing farms in Surrey sell for $123 an acre. Surrey is near London, and London is the world's great market for milk, butter, and cheese. But that market is not the English farmer's market. The Canadians, the New Zealanders, and the Danes possess it. Do you wonder that the English tariff commission recommends a duty on butter and cheese?

HOW THE GERMAN FARMERS ESCAPED THE TROUBLES OF THE AMERICAN AND ENGLISH FARMERS.

As we turn from England and her sad picture, we find another story in Germany and France, where statesmen and people united to preserve the equilibrium of the home market. I will quote again from Mr. James J. Hill's book, because Mr. Hill, one of the world's great captains of industry, is an unrivaled observer of economic facts. I wish that at this juncture his farm was bigger than his railroad, for where a man's treasure is there is his heart also. [Laughter.] Mr. Hill says:

How to meet German competition is to-day the study of every intelligent leader of industry and every cabinet on the Continent of Europe. It will be found that a large share of her world-wide success is due to symmetrical national development. Agricultural industry has not been slighted. Behold a contrast that throws light upon the idle host of England's unemployed marching despondently through streets whose shop windows are crowded with wares of German make. Between 1875 and 1900 in Great Britain 2,691,428 acres which were under cereals and 755,255 acres which were under green crops went out of cultivation. In Germany, during the same period, the cultivated area grew from 22,840,950 to 23,971,573 hectares, an increase of 5 per cent.

The German farmer owes his proud position largely to the wisdom of Bismarck, a statesman of that school who investigate first and then act, instead of acting first and investigating afterwards. [Applause.] He had been a free trader, but facts converted him, and in May, 1879, he bore this testimony in the Reichstag:

Is not the moment approaching when our agriculture will no longer be able to exist because corn is pressed down to a price at which it can not be remuneratively produced in Germany, taxation, the cost of living, and the cost of land being as they are? When that moment comes, then not only agriculture but the Prussian State and the German Empire will go to ruin as well.

And then and there the tariff duties of Germany on agricultural products were established, and the trend of her policy has been to raise them and not lower them.

HAPPY POSITION OF THE FRENCH FARMER UNDER PROTECTION.

In France we find the same lesson, yet France was menaced. "The trouble in France, as elsewhere," writes Meredith, an English authority, "centered in the persistent fall in the prices of agricultural produce, due in part to the general appreciation of gold, but due principally to the cheapening of transport and the appearance on the home market of transoceanic cereals and meat. The result was the increased protection of agricultural products in 1885 and 1887 and the tariff of 1892."

Mr. Hill, who is inclined to free trade, does not in his book notice the protective legislation of France and Germany, but the prosperity of France's agriculture to-day he paints in the most brilliant colors.

TARIFF ON AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS PROTECTS FROM TROUBLE.

It seems to me proven beyond a doubt that the opening of large areas of new lands tends to destroy agriculture in the old lands, and that the wisest statesmanship of the world forfends this calamity by protective tariffs.

When trouble comes to manufacturers, everyone—the statesman included—knows it. The great capitalists are in these halls; idle workmen are on the streets; outgoing steamers are crowded with foreign laborers returning home; other laborers search new employment. Willing minds study remedies, for the smoke no longer rises from the tall chimneys, the channels of trade dry up, and all know that times are hard. It is a sad thing when manufacturers are in trouble.

When the long dearth comes to the farmer there are no spectacular accompaniments. He finds one day that his market has dropped below the line of profit. He drives home sadly, searching his mind in vain for a cause that may lie at the end of a railroad a thousand miles away, or 10,000 miles away across two oceans. As prices continue low, he goes quietly to the local Pharoah, and soon the farmer holds the title and pays the taxes, while the Pharoah holds the mortgage and gets what little income there is, although there is not much in it for even the Pharoah. And so the long struggle goes on. When the farmer's arm fails, the children take up the battle—the son or the daughter. When the trouble comes to the factory, the machinery stops and the smoke ceases to roll from the tall chimney. The smoke does not fail in the farmhouse chimney, for on the hearth burns the oldest altar fire of the race. The farm goes on through the long dearth, but the hardship is more or less great.

It is because of the insidious ills that come with the destruction of equilibrium in the farmer's markets that legislative interference should be taken only after careful inquiry. Those bulwarks which you to-day are proposing to tear down without inquiry worthy of the name were last established by the labors of three great men—William McKinley, President; Thomas B. Reed, Speaker; and Nelson Dingley, chairman of Ways and Means. In a modest capacity I had the fortune to sit in their councils many times during their seven years' battle. With the greatest care and the utmost caution they raised the defenses of the farmer's market. They were wrong, you say. If they were wrong, then the systematic and painstaking German statesmen are wrong to-day. If they were wrong, then the philosophic statesmen of France are wrong to-day. If they were wrong, then the tariff commission of England toiled for years to search out truth only to produce error. Those three men had visions that reached the future, but they never let their feet stray from the highway of fact.

Agricultural prosperity was destroyed so long in the old-settled parts of this country that we are regarding as something abnormal the recent advance. There is, however, nothing abnormal about it. The West is coming to a normal condition of settlement; our wise tariff prevents foreign dumping; the natural equilibrium of markets is restored. No one who examines can doubt this. Prices—I mean those the farmer gets, not what the consumer pays—have been dropping for the last year, indicating that there are no abnormal increases.

WHAT WILL CANADIAN COMPETITION DO?

We now confront the next great question: "Will the opening up of our markets to Canadian farm products disturb this equilibrium and throw us back into the old distress?"

In other words, will enough Canadian farm products come over the line to disturb disastrously our markets? There is a great chorus from the large cities that no trouble need be feared by the farmer, that the consumer will pay about as much as ever, but that "trade relations" will be improved. But while this chorus is going on some very shrewd gentlemen in Wall Street are indulging in prophecy. The Canadian Pacific is the greatest railroad on the North American Continent. It connects all Canada and runs into all the great northern markets of the United States. If great quantities of Canadian products are coming in, that road will do most of the hauling. The day the trade agreement passed the House in March Canadian Pacific stock touched the highest point in its history, and it has been soaring ever since, in notable contrast most of the time to the American railroads. Some shrewd men evidently think that some butter, cheese, cream, milk, hay, potatoes, apples, wheat, and so forth, will come over the line. The situation recalls the story of the newspaper reporter who went to find out whether an eminent clergyman was going to accept a call to another city. "There is no decision about it," said the daughter, who met the reporter at the door, "father is upstairs praying for guidance, but mother is downstairs packing the trunks, so I guess we are going."

I do not propose to dwell long on the statistics of present trade in farm produce over the border. It is small and proves nothing except that Canada sends little here. But she sends much to England, and thereby proves that she could send much to our nearer markets.

In 1908 when Canada was sending us only 23,000 dozens of eggs she was sending England 1,200,000 dozen. While she has in the last five years sent to us an average of less than 100,000 pounds of butter a year she has sent to England as high as 33,000,000 pounds in a year. In the same five years she has sent us an average of less than 150,000 pounds of cheese a year, but her normal annual export to England was, until New Zealand began to shut her out, about 200,000,000 pounds. In 1900 she sent to us less than 20,000 barrels of apples, but in the same year she sent to England more than 1,000,000 barrels.

When a Canadian farmer sends cheese to England he meets there the competition of all the world, and the competitor whom he has to watch the sharpest is a man from the opposite side of the earth—the farmer of New Zealand. If the barriers along our border were down, if the greatest and best home market on earth was thrown open to his milk, cream, and butter, do you suppose the Canadian farmer would toil to make cheese to compete with a New Zealander in a market on the other side of an ocean 3,000 miles wide?

RELATION OF GREGORY KING'S LAW TO THE INFLUX OF CANADIAN SUPPLIES.

Does anyone know how much produce will break our market? Has any committee of this House investigated this great problem before plunging ahead to reverse the economic policy of a century and a quarter? We do not know on this floor, but one thing we can do is to examine the general nature of markets. More than 200 years ago Gregory King discovered the law of prices that bears his name. That law which Prof. Thorold Rogers tells us "is not thought of in times of high and low prices as it should be" is as follows:

In a commodity a deficit of—

1	tenth	raises	the	price	above	the	common	rate	3	tenths.
2	tenths	"	"	"	"	"	"	"	8	"
3	"	"	"	"	"	"	"	"	16	"
4	"	"	"	"	"	"	"	"	28	"
5	"	"	"	"	"	"	"	"	45	"

And this law applies similarly to the effects of a surplus in lowering the price below the common rate.

This law, called by a high authority "one of the most important generalizations in statistics," must not be neglected in the vast problem before us to-day.

GREGORY KING'S LAW AS ILLUSTRATING THE POTATO SITUATION.

In connection with this law of Gregory King, the potato situation in the United States is worth considering. While the consumer in the cities has found potato prices high the farmers know that potatoes have been low, around 25 cents a bushel. Our own farmers have overstocked our own home market, great as that is, our manufacturing industries alone disbursing to their officers and employees, who are consumers, over $3,000,000,000 a year in salaries and wages. Do you know how little of acreage participates in the overproduction that knocks down the potato market—to the producer, not to the consumer necessarily? Potatoes are produced all over the United States to an extent that meets a large proportion of the local demand, but 13 counties in what are called the 5 potato States, Maine, New York, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, make up the deficit and produce this year the two-tenths, or five-tenths of surplus, which, under Gregory King's law, drives down the price eight-tenths or forty-five tenths. Our 13 counties are liable to overstock even our magnificent home market, where $3,000,000,000 of industrial wages are floating about, and our potato farmer prospers only because he gets good years in with the bad. But add to our 13 counties the acreage of the great potato Provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Quebec, with the hope of our near-by home market to stimulate their farmers, and bad years must inevitably be constant. Their whole surplus will pour over our line, because they have no home market to absorb it. The industrial disbursements of those Provinces are but little more than those of the little State of Rhode Island.

If you want to know the capacity of the potato land of New Brunswick I will cite you to the fact that the single Maine county of Aroostook, which lies adjacent to New Brunswick and has similar land, produced in 1909 about one-tenth of the entire potato crop of the United States. I understand that the Legislature of New Brunswick, like the Legislature of Maine, has withheld its sanction from this trade agreement. Some gentlemen have thought this strange. It seems to me that there is nothing strange in it. If, under the glittering lure of the American market, Canada develops her potato land—and to-day she is not doing it, for want of a market—she will make the American farmer poor and her own farmer poor, too. The destruction of the equilibrium of our market will not in the end benefit her. When the western United States farmer was flooding the cereal and dairy market of the eastern United States, he did not prosper. Kansas appeared to bleed in those days as she had never bled before. And the potato farmers of both Maine and New Brunswick, who now have to pay millions of dollars annually for fertilizers, may look with alarm to that rich virgin soil of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta, where the few straggling pioneer farmers in that vast domain produced in 1909 10,000,000 bushels of potatoes.

CONDITIONS IN CANADA'S FOUR EASTERN PROVINCES.

Canada has all the conditions for a great agricultural development inevitable to destroy the equilibrium of our market. Except in the Province of Ontario, she has no home market to speak of to absorb the surplus of her farmers. In the four Provinces of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Quebec, out of 2,500,000 people at the last census about 150,000 were wage earners in industrial establishments, and their annual wages amounted to a little over $50,000,000. The little State of Rhode Island alone had that year two-thirds as many industrial wage earners and disbursed to them over $43,000,000 in wages. But those four Provinces of Canada have an area far greater than all New England, with New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois added. The four Provinces live to themselves. When we speak of growing Canada we mean Ontario and the west. In the 20 years comprised by the two last Canadian censuses, the four vast eastern Provinces added to their population 300,000. In one decade of that 20 years the State of Massachusetts increased nearly twice 300,000, and Mr. Archibald Blue, commissioner of the coming Canadian census, is quoted in the papers as predicting scarcely any increase in the eastern Provinces, but a large growth in western Canada. There is little prospect for advance in those eastern Provinces unless we divert to them purchases we now make from our own farmers. The farmers of eastern Canada, having no markets except the distant English market, live to themselves. But if stirred into life by access to our home market, they will show great capacity for exportations, because they have no home market to absorb their surplus.

BOUNDLESS RESOURCES OF WESTERN CANADA AS A COMPETITOR.

When we turn to western Canada we have a repetition of the conditions which once prevailed in the United States. Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta, and British Columbia are an empire of a million square miles. The Canadian representative at the International Institute at Rome told the delegates last year the prairie provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta were as large as England, France, Germany, and Italy. The five great western Provinces, rich in a fertile soil, have a domain as great as that of the combined States of Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, the two Dakotas, Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, and Texas. When you remember the vast flood of agricultural produce that those States have poured into the markets of the world we can form some idea of what western Canada will do to the equilibrium of markets for the next two generations of Americans. The London Economist, England's great journal of finance and trade, has recently sent a correspondent into Canada west. After noting that the United States produced 600,000,000 bushels of wheat in 1910, this correspondent records that in the Canadian west there are 200,000,000 acres of wheat land not yet touched by the plow that can produce 3,000,000,000 bushels of wheat annually, and there are furthermore 250,000,000 acres suitable for cattle raising. But wheat and cattle are not the only products. In 1909 Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta produced 10,000,000 bushels of potatoes, and in the last year the dairy commissioner of Canada has noted that the dairying industry is growing rapidly in northern Saskatchewan and northern Alberta. Northern Ontario, hitherto almost unknown, but now opened up for mining, has been found to have splendid potato land, equaling the best in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. The Canadian Pacific and Grank Trunk are opening up this region to settlers and promise to make it as populous as older Ontario.

We have supposed that western Canada was a cold country, but last year in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta half the seeding was done by the end of March; in Saskatchewan young stock began to run on the prairies early in March; and in October last the superintendent of the Government farm at Indian Head, Manitoba, wrote that the cattle were still in pasture, while fall plowing continued in Alberta until November 25. It has been assumed that corn can not be raised there, but in August, 1910, the superintendent of the experimental farm at Brandon, Manitoba, wrote, "Corn is a splendid crop." Such, then, is Canada, west and east, in what are known as the nine Provinces. They have an area of agricultural lands nearly equal to half the entire area of continental United States. Its possibilities for agricultural development are unlimited. Give to those lands our home market and two generations of American farmers will not see the equilibrium of their market restored.

When we had the last destruction of equilibrium and the long dearth began there were no riots, no outcries, but there was sadness and consternation in many hillside homes. And as they always do when the home farm becomes unprosperous, the young people went forth to what they heard were richer lands. In my youth I saw them go and witnessed the tears and lamentations of that going. I have lived to see their children come back to visit the old homes, strong men and noble women, strangers to their father's home, but Americans all, with the common traditions and the common hopes of the land of the free.

Pass this bill, put into force this old reactionary policy that the rest of the world has discarded, that even England wants to discard, and the dearth will begin again, the young men and the young women will turn their faces again to the setting sun—not to Missouri or Iowa, but to Saskatchewan and Alberta. And some day their children will revisit their father's homes. I do not doubt the magnificence of the manhood and the womanhood they will bring; but they will not be of the assets of this country. They will come from an alien land, from under a foreign flag, and out of strange eyes they will look on the countrymen of Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln. [Applause on the Republican side.]

VAST POSSIBILITIES OF AGRICULTURAL DEVELOPMENT IN THE UNITED STATES.

If we admit, as we must, that Canada will destroy the prosperity of our agriculture, yet we have to deal with the insistent question of those who press this bill, "What are we to do for food in the United States if we do not have Canada's supplies?" This question is none the less insistent although the prices the farmer gets are falling right along in the face of increased crops.

If we are honest with ourselves, the answer to this question is startling. What the United States needs to-day, if there is a shortage of food, is not the wholesale and slap-dash addition of vast areas to the sphere of our home market, but the systematic and gradual improvement of the acres we have. It is not flattering to our pride; but in our agricultural methods we rank with the second-rate nations, Spain, Russia, India, and not with the leaders, Great Britain, Germany, France, Austria, and Hungary. The International Institute at Rome has averaged the wheat yield for the world for the five years preceding 1908 and finds that where the United States produces less than 14 bushels to the acre Great Britain produces over 31, Germany over 29, France over 20, Austria over 19, Hungary over 17.

To quote again from Mr. James J. Hill's book, Highways of Progress, he has this about agriculture in the United States:

Only one-half the land in private ownership is now tilled. That tillage does not produce one-half what the land might be made to yield, without losing an atom of its fertility.

In profit we are satisfied with a small yield at the expense of the most rapid soil deterioration. We are satisfied with a national annual average product of $11.38 per acre at the cost of a diminishing annual return from the same fields, when we might as well secure two to three times that sum.

WE SHOULD ENCOURAGE AND NOT DISCOURAGE THE FARMER.

I feel as humiliated as Mr. Hill does at this showing of American agriculture. But there is a reason and excuse for it. For 30 years an opening of new lands at the expense of the old kept the farmer poor and discouraged by destroying the equilibrium of his markets. Discouraged farmers do not progress. The development of English tillage occurred in the days before the deluge from new lands; and that its excellence has been maintained through what the London Times of last June called "so protracted a struggle with overwhelming foreign competition" is a notable tribute to one of the finest races of farmers on earth.

The American farmer will forge to the front if our statesmanship will cease smashing his markets. [Applause on the Republican side.] The chart of our Agricultural Department shows that in the last few years, since his markets have been reaching equilibrium, the average production per acre in 10 leading crops has been the highest in 50 years. I am proud to say that in this development the farmers of Maine have an honorable preeminence.

MAINE AN EXAMPLE OF WHAT FAIR MARKETS WILL DO.

I will again cite Maine as an example of the benefits of fair markets as contrasted with unbalanced markets and as an example of what farmers will do under proper conditions. In that State in the decade just closed farm lands have increased 75 per cent in value, or a total for that State of $30,000,000 increase. The farm lands and buildings in that State in the last decade have increased over $62,000,000 in value. From 1880 to 1900, 5,000 farms, every one of them a home, had ceased to exist. From 1900 to 1910 the farms of Maine increased in number by nearly 500, and the long tendency toward abandonment was practically checked. This was not the only healthful sign. The number owning farms increased, the number of tenant farmers decreased, the annual expenditures for farm labor increased from two and a half million dollars to $5,000,000, and most significant of all, the expenditures for fertilizers increased from a little over $800,000 to more than $5,000,000.

I have commented on the shortsightedness of considering this question from the standpoint of the farmer alone. This prosperity of the farmer has reacted on the cities. In Maine, the metropolis, Portland, has grown as in no previous decade of her history. When 5,000 farms of Maine were going out of business progress was slow. With the farmer prosperous, all else prospers, for he spends his money at home. But if by this new policy we are to increase the purchasing power of the potato farmer of New Brunswick, Ontario, and Saskatchewan, the apple farmer of Nova Scotia, the dairyman of Quebec, those farmers will spend their money in their own cities. If they spend it in ours they must hoist their goods over a high Canadian tariff wall before they can get them home, because of the articles for which we might have a market in Canada very few are made free by this bill.

If I may be pardoned again for citing the example of Maine, which is the great agricultural State of New England, I will call attention to a most happy effect of the restoration of equilibrium in the farmer's market. That is the increase of rural population in towns under 4,000.

In the two decades preceding 1900 all the growth of the State was in the cities and large villages. The rural communities made a startling decrease. In the gain of the whole State in the last decade—a gain which greatly exceeds that of the preceding decade—the cities do not contribute all and then help make up a deficit for the country. The country and small villages gained one-third of the total gain, and even the towns under 2,000 population turned the tide of loss. Give us equilibrium of markets for another decade and the old prosperity of country life in America will return, for what the census shows as to Maine will undoubtedly be found true in many other States, especially in the East and South.

THE GREATEST OPPORTUNITY FOR CONSERVATION.

There is no limit for many years to the progress which our farmers may make for themselves and for the cities which supply them. To quote again from James J. Hill's book:

> An industrious, fairly intelligent, and exceedingly comfortable agricultural community can raise from the soil food enough for the needs of 490 persons to the square mile. Adopting that ratio, the 414,498,487 acres of improved farm lands in the United States on the date of the last official report—an area materially enlarged by the present time—would support in comfort 317,350,405 people, enabling them at the same time to raise considerable food for export and to engage in necessary manufacturing employments. Applying the same ratio to the entire acreage of farm lands within the United States, both improved and unimproved, which was at the same date 838,591,774, the population indicated as able to live with comfort and prosperity on the actually existing agricultural area of this country, under an intelligent system and a fairly competent but by no means highly scientific method of agriculture, rises to 642,046,823.

[Applause.]

Let any gentleman who sees golden visions of prosperity in buying from the Canadian farmers instead of from our own farmers apply Mr. Hill's estimate to his own State. Such a development of agriculture, with a harmonious supplementary development of manufactures on her great water powers, would give to Maine a population of 5,000,000 people. Her commercial metropolis, Portland, would find in that population business to justify a great and healthy growth, based on a prosperous country about. Is not that growth better than the congestion of people driven from unprofitable farms to seek employment in the city, like the idle thousands of London who tramp the streets in want while the acres of England are going out of cultivation? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Here lies the greatest conservation opportunity ever placed before a nation. It is an opportunity that can be seized only by the efforts of the farmers. And yet we to-day are proposing to take the heart out of their efforts by destroying the natural equilibrium of their home market. [Applause on the Republican side.]

THE FARMER NOT RESPONSIBLE FOR COST OF LIVING IN THE CITIES.

While the proposed proceeding against the farmer is evidently indefensible, the outcry in the cities against the high cost of living impels us onward in our search for a victim. We all admit the high prices; many of us are oppressed by them; few of us know that wholesale prices have been falling for nearly a year, so much does the retail price affect us. But has anyone proven that the ruin of the American farmer will lower prices in the cities except as it may shrivel the business of the cities? And ought not some one to prove this before we proceed to spoil the farmer's home market for the next two generations?

To give a little personal experience, while the farmers of Maine have been getting 25 cents a bushel for potatoes, I have been paying for them a dollar a bushel. You may think this an extreme illustration of the difference between the price the farmer gets and the price the consumer pays. I am not certain that it is. Unfortunately we have had no investigation on this highly important point. In another distinguished body an inquiry was proposed last year, but, unless my memory is at fault, an appropriation for it was defeated by objection from the Democratic side of the Chamber. But our own observation and that of others will show us that there is a vast difference between consumers' prices and farmers' prices. Last summer Mr. B. F. Yoakum, head of the Frisco Railway system, published in the Saturday Evening Post an article on "The farmer and the cost of living," in which he set forth, after what he considered "a careful investigation," the food bill of New York City for the year as related to the farmer. Here it is:

	Received by farmer.	Paid by consumer.
Onions	$321,000	$8,212,000
Potatoes	8,437,000	60,000,000
Coffee	2,402,000	12,009,000
Rice	1,354,000	6,191,000
Cabbages	1,825,000	9,125,000
Milk	22,912,000	48,880,000
Eggs	17,238,000	28,730,000
Meat and poultry	219,300,000	291,000,000

Mr. Yoakum was not arguing on the tariff question, but on the need of railroad development, and therefore he may be considered an unprejudiced witness so far as this subject is concerned.

Mr. Yoakum shows that the price of the onion increased 10 times on its way from the farmer to the New York City consumer. If this high authority is correct, has anyone searched those people who have that onion between the time it leaves the farmer's hands and gets to the consumer? And if no one has, ought it not to be done before we try and convict the farmer as the robber and sentence him to lose his paltry protection of 40 cents a bushel on onions. Is the one who takes one-tenth for an onion he has planted and raised to be pursued and those who take nine-tenths escape investigation even?

Mr. Yoakum shows that the price of the potato increased more than seven times on its way from the farmer to the New York City consumer. If this high authority is correct, has anyone searched the people who have that potato between the time it leaves the farmer's hands and gets to the consumer?

And if no one has, ought it not to be done before we try and convict the farmer as the robber and sentence him to lose his paltry protection of 25 cents a bushel? Is the man who takes one-seventh for a potato he has planted and raised to be pursued, while no questions are to be asked as to those who get the six-sevenths?

Mr. Yoakum shows that the price of rice increased five times from the hands of the farmer to the hands of the consumer. If this high authority is correct, has anyone searched the people who have that rice between the time it leaves the farmer's hands and gets to the consumer? And if no one has, ought it not to be done before we try and convict the rice farmer and take from him the duty of 2 cents a pound. This bill, it is true, does not touch rice; but does the rice farmer of the Carolinas think that protection is going to last for the few after it is stripped from the many?

Mr. Yoakum shows that the price of eggs doubles from the time they leave the farmer's hands to the time they reach the consumer's hands in New York. As our own Agricultural Department has published figures tending to confirm this estimate, it gives confidence in the estimates as to other commodities, startling as they may seem.

Who gets the great increases between the farmer and the consumer? I see no evidence that the retail merchant gets more than his necessities as to rent, display, advertising, labor, and service compel him to take. We can conjecture as to the causes, but we have not ascertained scientifically.

THE TARIFF OF NO EFFECT ON PRICES TO THE CONSUMER.

The price of coffee is estimated to increase five times from the producer to the consumer; and as there is absolutely free trade in coffee, here is a patent suggestion that the tariff, while it has important bearing on the equilibrium of the farmer's market, has very little influence on what the consumer pays. In the very height of high prices last fall the minority Democratic members of the investigating committee of another distinguished body came to this conclusion:

Notwithstanding the large increase in the price of farm products, the farmer has realized a small net return on his labor and investment.

Can not you leave the farmer this small net return? Can not you do it in consideration of the long dearth he has suffered? There he stands, the dampness of honest toil on his brow, in his heart the satisfaction that he has lasted through the trial. He is a hero. He has won the long fight. He has done it with brains as well as muscle. When the onset was fiercest he reduced his acreage and intensified his culture; that is, he contracted the wings and strengthened the center. If he had been a man with a sword we would have given him pension and office, and that exquisite American adulation of accepting every word from his lips as the last thing in wisdom. But as he is a farmer, and as farmers are organized very imperfectly for unity of action, we pat him on the back, say he is a good fellow, and, without investigation, without even an unscientific investigation worthy the name, we turn loose on him new and unnumbered hordes. [Applause on the Republican side.]

CONSUMERS OF COAL, FLOUR, AND MEAT.

By admitting that this question should be settled on broad, national grounds only, I do not wish to be understood as condoning in any way the great injustices committed on certain industries and certain sections of the country. It has been a longing of New England, stimulated by the Democratic orators for more than half a century, that she might buy coal at those great and near-by mines of Nova Scotia. Gov. Foss of Massachusetts told us last fall that free coal was one of the great blessings of reciprocity for us. But realizing the benefit of the broad national policy of protection, the better judgment of our people has favored buying coal in the distant fields of Pennsylvania and West Virginia, although the freight paid to the railroads is a burden on industry. The old reciprocity treaty of 1854 gave this Canadian coal free entrance, and the official documents of the time seem to show that it found a large market on the Atlantic seaboard. This new treaty lets in over the border line freely every natural product that New England produces herself; but this one great commodity that she does not produce, that her northern climate makes so precious to her people, is denied her. The old treaty wrote in "coal" in bold, satisfying black letters; this agreement, if it does anything in this line, makes only a penurious little concession by reducing the duty on coal screenings to 15 cents a ton, which it was in the Dingley law, where it was intended to be in the Payne law. That may help some big mills, if they use these screenings, and is good as far as it goes; but the most sedate New England farmer, if he can control his anger at the injustice, will hardly control his mirth at the ridiculousness of an arrangement that sets in motion into his market free as air all the potatoes, beets, turnips, hay, cabbages, butter, cheese, hoof-parting and cud-chewing animals that Canada can produce, and allow himself and his neighbors such coal as will strain through a hole half an inch square.

It would be possible to go much further in criticism of details of this agreement. If duties between this country and Canada are burdens, which I do not admit, it may be pointed out that we are taking all burdens off the flour-makers and leaving much on the flour consumers; that we are taking all burden off the great incorporated butchers' trust and leaving much on the consumers of meat.

THE FISHERIES AND OTHER INDUSTRIES.

If this were a council of national defense I would recall that the two great militant civilizations of Europe, Germany and France, protect by ample duties the hard-won spoil of their fishermen, that they may have those fishermen in their hour of need, as we have had ours in every crisis since Washington crossed the Delaware. After preserving in the field of diplomacy the fishing rights won by our fathers on the field of battle, John Quincy Adams transmitted to his posterity a seal intended to commemorate the glory both of his country and his family. And the legend on that seal was such as you could not honestly write across the face of this bill—"Piscemur, venemur, ut olim"—"We keep our fishing grounds and our hunting grounds as of old."

THE SAFE AND UNSAFE COURSE.

It is because we are in doubt as to the main features of this great problem and are overriding facts where inquiry seems to have removed doubts, that I confess a great impatience of this capital move that the House seems about to make. The European nations, where scholarship and scientific inquiry is applied to political problems as nowhere else on earth, Germany and France, strictly maintain their agricultural duties. The tariff commission of England, after collecting volumes of facts, has recommended agricultural duties for England.

Years ago, on a stormy afternoon, a gallant steamer sailed down an eastern harbor on its way to a coastwise port. As she went down that harbor other steamers running to that same coast were coming back, for the sky and sea promised ill, but that one steamer went on in defiance of the common judgment of the sea that afternoon. And she went to one of the great sea tragedies of the Atlantic.

Is this House to disregard the common judgment of the nations and without investigation plunge forward to do this great thing? Even before you change the postage rates on a few magazines you have an investigation by a learned commission. But you propose to change the fundamental conditions of 6,000,000 farm homes with no investigation worthy the name.

As one Member I protest against this dangerous haste and against this bill, as tending to break up farm homes, retard rural development, and increase the congestion of the cities. [Loud applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield some further time on his side.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I am afraid I have no person here now to whom I can do it, it is so late.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I hope that hereafter this debate will run in the afternoon longer than it has this evening.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I quite agree with the gentleman, but he should remember that this is Saturday afternoon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that this is Saturday afternoon and that to-morrow is Easter, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4412, the Canadian reciprocity bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill and joint resolutions of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 745. An act providing for the erection of a statue to Thomas Jefferson at Washington, D. C.; to the Committee on the Library.

S. J. Res. 5. Joint resolution to create a joint committee to continue the consideration of the revision and codification of the laws of the United States; to the Committee on Rules.

S. J. Res. 8. Joint resolution authorizing the selection of a site and the erection of a statue of Alexander Hamilton in Washington, D. C.; to the Committee on the Library.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then, on motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD (at 4 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until Monday, April 17, 1911, at 12 o'clock m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of Deckers Creek, W. Va. (H. Doc. No. 14), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred, as follows:

By Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio: A bill (H. R. 5286) for the erection of a public building at the city of Upper Sandusky, in the State of Ohio, and appropriating moneys therefor; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5287) for the erection of a public building at the city of Bellevue, in the State of Ohio, and appropriating money therefor; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5288) for the purchase of a site and the erection thereon of a public building at Clyde, Ohio; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5289) for the erection of a public building at the city of Fremont, in the State of Ohio, and appropriating moneys therefor; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. BINGHAM: A bill (H. MONUMENT TO GEORGE ROGERS CLARK.

Mr. BRADLEY. I introduce a bill and ask that it be read.

The bill (S. 1327) to provide for the selection and purchase of a site for and erection of a monument or memorial to the memory of Gen. George Rogers Clark was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on the Library, as follows:

Whereas Gen. George Rogers Clark, under seeming impossibilities, through the severest hardships that ever attended any successful military campaign, and by the exercise of the most wonderful generalship recorded in the annals of history, won and secured to the United States our immense northwestern territory, making feasible the acquisition of the vast territory embraced in the Louisiana Purchase, thereby winning for himself the name of "the Empire Builder of the West"; and

Whereas his remains are now interred in Cave Hill Cemetery, near Louisville, Ky., unmarked except by a modest headstone: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That William H. Taft, Theodore Roosevelt, John M. Harlan, Champ Clark, and Thomas R. Marshall be, and they are hereby, created a commission to be known as "The Clark monument or memorial commission" to select and procure a location at some point in Jefferson County, Ky., and to select a plan and design for a monument or memorial to be erected in said county to the memory of Gen. George Rogers Clark, subject to the approval of Congress.

SEC. 2. That in the discharge of its duties hereunder said commission is authorized to employ the services of such artists, sculptors, architects, and others as it shall deem necessary, and to avail itself of the services or advice of the Commission of Fine Arts, created by the act approved May 17, 1910.

SEC. 3. That this construction shall be entered upon as speedily as practicable after the plan and design therefor is determined upon and approved by Congress, and shall be prosecuted to completion under the direction of said commission and the Secretary of War, under a contract hereby authorized to be entered into by said Secretary in a total sum not exceeding $300,000.

SEC. 4. That vacancies occurring in the membership of the commission shall be filled by appointment by the President of the United States: Provided, That no member hereby or hereafter appointed shall receive any compensation for his services save necessary expenses incurred thereby.

SEC. 5. That to defray the necessary expenses of the commission herein created and the cost of procuring plans or designs for a monument or memorial as aforesaid, there is hereby appropriated the sum of $10,000, to be immediately available.

SEC. 6. That said commission shall annually submit to Congress an estimate of the amount of money necessary to be expended to carry out the work herein authorized.

PUBLICITY OF ELECTION CONTRIBUTIONS.

Mr. OWEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 2958) to amend an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected," which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

H. R. 2958. An act to amend an act entitled "An act providing for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected," was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States was read twice by its title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think the joint resolution ought to go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Similar joint resolutions formerly went to that committee, with the exception of a joint resolution in the last Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

BOARD OF MANAGERS, NATIONAL SOLDIERS' HOME.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I introduce a joint resolution, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 14) for appointment of a member of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That Hon. Nathan Bay Scott, of West Virginia, be, and he is hereby, appointed as a member of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers of the United States, to succeed Capt. Henry E. Palmer, deceased, whose term of office would expire April 21, 1916.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BROWN subsequently said: I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which in my absence this morning Senate joint resolution 14, with reference to a vacancy in the Board of Managers of the Soldiers' Home, was passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska enters a motion for a reconsideration of the votes by which Senate joint resolution 14 was engrossed, read the third time, and passed.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. WARREN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 20), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized to send for persons and papers and to administer oaths and to employ a stenographer to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be pending before said committee, and to have the same printed for its use; that the committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate, and that the expense thereof be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

AFFAIRS IN MEXICO.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution which I ask may be read and lie on the table. At a later day

I will move its reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I desire, however, before that is done at an early day, possibly at the next meeting of the Senate, to make the resolution the basis of some observations.

The resolution (S. Res. 19) was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Whereas a condition of turbulence and disorder prevails throughout the Republic of Mexico; and

Whereas as a result of such turbulence and disorder, it is reported that the lives of a large number of American citizens resident in Mexico are imperiled, and that their property is in danger of lawless appropriation by bands of irresponsible men; and

Whereas in conflicts between the military forces of the Mexican Government and revolutionists near the border line between the United States and Mexico several American citizens on the American side of the boundary line have been slain as the result of Mexicans firing across the line, and other American citizens while peaceably pursuing their avocations or while in their homes have been wounded; and

Whereas a great and important public work on the Colorado River in Lower California is being constructed by Americans, and for which work Congress has made a large appropriation, and which work is being constructed on the Mexican side by American engineers and contractors under an agreement made with the Mexican Government, is being obstructed and endangered by repeated interferences of lawless bands of Mexican revolutionists who have at different times appropriated property of the contractors engaged in the work and have so seriously delayed the work as to greatly endanger it by threatening the lives of workmen and thus disorganizing the working force; and

Whereas numerous leading newspapers in Europe, especially in London, report that certain European Governments, many of whose subjects and citizens reside in Mexico and have large property interests there, are contemplating some intervention by force in the affairs of the Mexican Republic, ostensibly for the protection of the lives and interests of their people; and

Whereas one European power has already landed on Mexican territory an armed force of marines from one of its warships under the pretense of preventing an attack upon a Mexican town by revolutionary forces; and

Whereas this unfortunate condition in the governmental and political affairs of Mexico appears to grow worse and more acute from day to day: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be, and hereby is, directed to make speedy inquiry into the facts recited in the preamble hereto and into such other facts as said committee may deem necessary to a complete explanation and exposition of the actual conditions prevailing in Mexico, and said committee is directed to make report of its findings, with such recommendations as the committee may deem advisable, respecting the duty of the United States in the premises, and which report may be made to the Senate in open or executive session, as the said committee may deem most expedient in the public interest.

AMENDMENTS TO TARIFF BILLS.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in pursuance of a notice heretofore given by me, I submit the following resolution, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee on Rules.

The resolution (S. Res. 18) was read and referred to the Committee on Rules, as follows:

Resolved, That there be added as one of the standing rules of the Senate the following, to wit:

"That no amendment to any bill passed by the House amending or changing by general application the import duties prescribed by existing law shall be in order or allowed in the Senate unless such proposed amendment seeks to amend or change a paragraph or item embraced in the schedule or schedules, all or a part of which is sought to be amended or changed by the House bill, or unless such proposed amendment is directly related to the subject matter of the House bill and is germane thereto."

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I noticed a moment ago that House joint resolution 39 providing for the direct election of Senators by the people was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. During the last Congress a similar joint resolution, introduced by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and was there considered and reported to the Senate. In looking up the precedents with regard to resolutions upon this particular subject I find that prior to the last Congress references had been made to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I make this statement now so as to account, perhaps, for the fact that I did not ask that the joint resolution go in this case to the Committee on the Judiciary and did not object to its being placed in the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I ask, for information, whether it is true that other joint resolutions with reference to the election of Senators by direct vote have gone at this session to the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As a matter of information, the Chair, of his own knowledge, can not tell the Senator. The Secretary informs the Chair, however, that they have been so referred. It would be the Chair's notion to refer such joint resolutions to the Committee on the Judiciary; but a request otherwise was made, and by unanimous consent, the matter being put by the Chair to the Senate, the reference was made to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, in the interest of uniformity of procedure, if there is no graver reason—and I think perhaps other reasons might be shown—resolutions on this subject should be referred to some one committee; the appropriate committee should be determined; and the question being before the Senate, it might as well be determined now as at another time. I ask unanimous consent that all bills or resolutions heretofore introduced in the Senate at this session of Congress directed to a change in the system of electing United States Senators be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. For that purpose I also ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of all bills and joint resolutions relating to the election of Senators by direct vote of the people which may have heretofore at the present session been referred to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of all bills and joint resolutions relating to the election of Senators by direct vote of the people which have been introduced at this session of Congress and referred to that committee, and that such bills and joint resolutions be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Is there objection?

Mr. CULBERSON. I object to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I myself think that the joint resolution which has been referred this morning to the Committee on Privileges and Elections should be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. It relates not to the ordinary matter of the privileges of the floor and the election of Senators, but it relates to a change in the fundamental law of the land, a change in the Constitution of the United States. If there is any question which should be referred to the law committee of the Senate, it is a proposition to make a change in the Constitution.

It will not do to say, Mr. President, that such a question should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections because of the fact that it relates to the particular matter of an election, for, if that argument is good, then every proposition to change the Constitution would, when presented, be referred to some other committee than the Committee on the Judiciary. It would be referred to some committee which had charge of a subject that was more nearly related to the direct object of the change.

The object of the appointment of a Judiciary Committee is to have referred to it questions which affect the enactment of law which relates to the judiciary system and other matters which relate strictly to a legal question. I think, therefore, that all proposed changes in the Constitution ought to go to the Judiciary Committee.

I will say that, of course, everybody recognizes that the lawyers on the Committee on Privileges and Elections are just as able as are the lawyers on the Judiciary Committee, but it is not a fact that it is necessary that all members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections should be lawyers, whereas it is considered necessary that all members of the Judiciary Committee should be lawyers.

This particular question is one that in the last Congress was dealt with by the Judiciary Committee exclusively. That committee had charge of all proposed legislation upon that subject. It brought a joint resolution into the Senate, which was acted upon by the Senate, and other resolutions on the same lines which have been introduced in the Senate during the present session have already been referred to the Judiciary Committee.

We have considered the question, Mr. President, as to the reference of bills to the Judiciary Committee in relation to other matters. I remember that in a former session—I have forgotten whether it was in the last session—there was legislation proposed for Porto Rico the nature of which properly would bring it more directly to the consideration of the Judiciary Committee. The question was raised whether it should not go to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico. It was contended that it should go to that committee. There were questions involved which related to the judicial system of Porto Rico and other questions which related to the confirmation of judicial officers in Porto Rico. The contention then was that as we had a special committee to consider those matters the proposed legislation should go to that committee rather than to the Judiciary Committee. After consideration, it was determined that, while the legislation did relate to Porto Rican matters, its nature was such as properly required its reference to the Judiciary Committee.

Analogizing that to the present case, while it is true that this proposed change relates to the election of Senators, the nature of it involves the gravest of all considerations, such as should be in charge, it seems to me, of the Judiciary Committee. I trust that it may be so referred.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it is not my intention to enter into an extended consideration of this question, but some suggestions made by the Senator from Georgia in giving reasons why this proposed legislation should go to the Judiciary Committee seem to me to call for more than a passing notice.

The Senator, if I understood his remarks and their purport, suggested that because of the gravity of the question, because of the necessity for high consideration, it should go to the Judiciary Committee. If I misunderstood the Senator, I should be very glad to be corrected.

Mr. BACON. The Senator misunderstands me in a certain application, certainly, if he thinks I used any such language as that. I mean this: That the class of questions which properly goes to the Judiciary Committee is the class that relates to a change in the Constitution, and that among the class of questions which should properly go to the Judiciary Committee this was one of the gravest. I do not mean to say, Mr. President, that a grave question ought not to be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. There could not be any graver question before the Senate than the right of a Senator to his seat on this floor, and yet nobody would contend that because of the fact that it was such a grave question it should go to the Judiciary Committee.

I hope that illustration disabuses the mind of the honorable and learned Senator of any suggestion that I intended to imply that because the question was grave it ought not to go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I say, belonging to the class of questions which should properly go to the Judiciary Committee, and being one of the gravest of that class, it should go to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not intend to criticize the Senator. I merely desired to draw forth such an expression as would leave no question in the RECORD as to what the Senator from Georgia intended by his remarks.

I am inclined to think that such a joint resolution should go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. It pertains to the election of Senators and to their privilege as Senators. The Judiciary Committee has nothing especially to do, more than another, with such a question. Through accident, I think during the last Congress, such a resolution went to the Committee on the Judiciary and was reported out of that committee and rejected by the Senate.

It is not fair to the Committee on Privileges and Elections to send matters of this kind to another committee, in view of the fact that in the past, relying upon precedent or rather appealing to it, such matters have been referred to and reported back by the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

I regret that the ranking member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections is not present. I sent for him, but have not been able to call his attention to the fact that this question is being considered. I think it had better rest without action until he is present.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I called attention to the reference by the Chair to the Committee on Privileges and Elections because of the fact that I cared not, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, this morning to insist that that committee be given the consideration of this particular joint resolution. During the last Congress, as I before remarked, a similar resolution was presented. It was then thought best to send it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but having in my mind exactly the idea suggested by the Senator from Georgia, that this is a matter which went to the amendment of the fundamental law of the land, and without personal knowledge of the course that other like resolutions had taken theretofore, I moved, and the motion was sustained, that the joint resolution go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

That committee has heretofore considered a like joint resolution and reported to the Senate the result of its labors. Since that time my attention has been called to the fact that the invariable practice of the Senate theretofore has been to send this identical subject matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections; that that course was agreed to by the eminent Senator from Massachusetts, Mr. Hoar, who made one report from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and by the Senator from Indiana, Mr. Turpie, who made a minority report from that committee. Therefore, and further in view of the fact that the Judiciary Committee has also pending before it now a similar resolution, I made no objection to the reference as made by the Chair in the present instance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask what disposition has been made of the joint resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that reference has not been changed. No suggestion has been made to change it. The joint resolution is now with the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas moves that the Committee on Privileges and Elections be discharged——

Mr. CULBERSON. I will simply state that there is now pending before that committee three joint resolutions on the same subject, introduced at this session, and referred without question at the time they were introduced.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a single word. It was at my instance, I believe, that the reference was made to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I was cognizant of the fact that always prior to the last session such reference had been made, and I kept in mind the further fact that the Committee on the Judiciary is a committee having a very large number of bills before it—an overworked committee—while the Committee on Privileges and Elections has practically nothing to do, provided this joint resolution goes to the Committee on the Judiciary. I believe that the reference as made is the proper reference, and I trust that the committee will not be discharged and the reference changed.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand that the matter is in such a position before the Senate that one objection carries it over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas moves that the Committee on Privileges and Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is not my motion I submit to the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the only motion——

Mr. CULBERSON. I understood the Chair had made the reference against its judgment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Senator is incorrect in the fact. The Chair had originally suggested a reference to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Senator from New Hampshire then asked that the reference be to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The Chair then stated, after waiting a reasonable length of time, that unless there was objection the reference would be as suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire. That reference was made.

Some little time after—a lot of business intervening—the matter was again brought up, at the present time. Now, the joint resolution is with the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. CULBERSON. The joint resolution has been referred?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. Now I move that the action of the Senate in referring the joint resolution to the Committee on Privileges and Elections be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that that go over.

Mr. CULBERSON. Not to discharge the committee, in that form, nor was any such purpose intended by me originally.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the motion go over.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Georgia will wait one moment, the Senator from Idaho asks that the motion of the Senator from Texas go over until to-morrow. The Chair hardly thinks it is a motion which must go over as a matter of right. A motion to discharge the committee would have to go over, but a motion to reconsider the action of the Senate just taken does not have to go over, the Chair thinks, under the rule.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not controvert the decision of the Chair, for I think the Chair is correct, but I think the motion is an improper one, because, as I understand the rule, no motion can be made during the morning hour that does not go over under objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion would not be in order before 1 o'clock, the Chair thinks.

Mr. BACON. I desire, with the permission of the Chair, to make a suggestion. While the Chair has directed that the joint resolution be sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, it has not in fact been so sent. The committee has never been charged with it, has never received it, and really a motion to discharge the committee would not be in order. I want to say this——

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not the motion.

Mr. BACON. I understand that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas changed his motion.

Mr. BACON. I was simply premising that. The suggestion I wish to make is that in every tribunal, whether a legislative tribunal or a judicial tribunal, matters which are in process of disposition, until finally acted upon, are what are known in the legal procedure as in gremio legis—that is, in the bosom of the body; and it is not necessary, in my opinion, that there should be any motion to reconsider or any motion to discharge. It is simply sufficient for the body now having the matter still in its hands, it not having passed from it, simply to determine that it should go to such a committee rather than to the one previously indicated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that when business has intervened following a reference, the reference stands until the Senate takes some other action, but the Chair further thinks that the motion of the Senator from Texas would not be in order until after 1 o'clock. Then the motion could be made.

Mr. CULBERSON. I can enter it at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. Which is practically what I have done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Very well.

Mr. LODGE. If I may venture to make a suggestion, the desire is to carry the joint resolution over. Supposing the motion to reconsider prevails; that brings the joint resolution before the Senate again for its first reading. Of course, the second reading on the same day can only be had by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. LODGE. And a single objection to its second reading on the same day would send it over, which would carry the question of reference with it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was necessarily detained from the Chamber when this matter first arose, and I do not know that I am entirely familiar with the situation. As I understand, the reference was made to the Committee on Privileges and Elections; that thereafter the Senator from Texas made a motion to reconsider that reference; and that that motion, in the opinion of the Chair, could not be made, as a matter of fact, until 1 o'clock. If that is the situation, I do not care at this time to take up the time of the Senate——

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the situation.

Mr. BORAH. In discussing the matter, but will wait until the appropriate time to do so, at 1 o'clock.

LAWS OF PORTO RICO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States (S. Doc. No. 813, 61st Cong., 3d sess.), which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico and ordered to be printed (S. Doc. 11):

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by section 31 of the act of Congress approved April 12, 1911, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenues and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith copies of the acts and resolutions enacted by the Legislative Assembly of Porto Rico during the session beginning January 9 and ending March 9, 1911.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 17, 1911.

RELATIONS WITH JAPAN.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, on January 30, 1911, American citizens resident in Japan held a meeting in Yokohama and considered the relations between this country and Japan. They adopted resolutions and some addresses were delivered, notably one by the American ambassador to Japan. From his address I desire to read into the RECORD two sentences, as follows:

> Let me assure you, Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen—and I ought to know something about it—that there is no cause under the sun why there should be distrust between the people of these two countries. [Applause.] There are no questions of importance pending, and no business being conducted diplomatically which should excite the suspicions or make the slightest trouble as between the two peoples.

This is not a very long pamphlet, and I should like to ask that it be printed as a public document.

Mr. SMOOT. I have examined the pamphlet, and I think no Senator will object to its publication as a document (S. Doc. No. 9). I do hope, however, that in future where any outside matters are desired to be published as public documents they will first be submitted to the Committee on Printing. I have no objection to the publication of this pamphlet.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being no objection, the order is entered.

BANKRUPTCY LAW.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask to have printed as a Senate document (S. Doc. No. 10) the United States bankruptcy law of July 1, 1898, and amendments thereto to June 25, 1910. Uniform system with marginal notes and index, and general orders and forms in bankruptcy, adopted and established by the Supreme Court of the United States November 28, 1898.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection that order is entered.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to ask also that 500 copies of the document be printed for the document room of the Senate. The request can either be passed upon now or referred to the Committee on Printing.

There being no objection, the order was reduced to writing and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That 500 additional copies of Senate Document No. 10, Sixty-second Congress, first session, United States bankruptcy law, be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY.

Mr. GALLINGER. In view of certain circumstances relating to the assignment of committees, which I need not explain, I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSTITUTIONS OF NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to call up, for the purpose of submitting some observations thereon, Senate joint resolution No. 2.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution indicated, which will be read by its title.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 2) approving the constitutions formed by the constitutional conventions of the Territory of New Mexico and the Territory of Arizona.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the Sixty-first Congress passed an act entitled "An act to enable the people of New Mexico to form a constitution and State government and be admitted to the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to enable the people of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted to the Union on an equal footing with the original States." This act was approved by the President on the 20th day of June, 1910.

On the 21st day of January, 1911, the people of New Mexico adopted a constitution, and on the 7th day of February, 1911, the people of Arizona adopted theirs. An effort was made in the expiring moments of the last Congress to adopt House joint resolution 295, approving the constitution of New Mexico, and the purpose of the friends of the resolution, in the light of subsequent events, seems to have been to admit New Mexico to the Union and postpone or defeat the admission of Arizona. But if this was the purpose it was defeated, because the friends of Arizona were there to insist that the same treatment should be accorded to the people of both Territories, and the splendid fight made by the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma to see that equal and exact justice should be accorded to the people of both is fresh in the minds of most of the Members of this body.

No enabling act was necessary under the Constitution, nor under any law of Congress, to authorize the people of either of these Territories to apply to Congress for admission to the Union. On the contrary, the method of procedure has been left entirely to the States, and in some instances, notably upon the admission of Vermont, Kentucky, Tennessee, Maine, Michigan, Arkansas, Florida, Idaho, California, and Oregon, the initial steps were taken for the preparation of their constitutions and admission to the Union without any enabling acts having been previously passed by Congress.

The act in question is the first in the history of our country where provision has been made in a single act enabling two Territories to take the initial steps looking to the framing and adoption of a constitution as preliminary to their knocking at the doors of Congress for admission as component parts of the Federal Union. The restrictions and limitations applicable to each of the Territories in question are practically the same, and I shall insist that both Territories are entitled to admission at one and the same time under the same terms and conditions, if they have met the requirements of the Constitution and the act of authorization, and the conditions exist in both which entitle them to admission at the hands of this Congress.

I do not understand that any objection is made to their admission on the ground that the necessary conditions do not exist in both to entitle them to admission, or that any objection whatsoever has heretofore been made to the admission of the Territory of New Mexico, either because of any constitutional inhibition or any alleged violation of the Constitution of the United States in the provisions of the constitution which her people have adopted and certified up through the proper channels for the approval of Congress, notwithstanding the fact that they have adopted one entirely hostile to their best interests; but it has been objected to the constitution adopted by the people of Arizona that it is violative of that portion of section 4 of Article IV of the Constitution of the United States, which provides that—

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government.

If the constitution adopted by the constitutional convention of Arizona is violative of this provision, it is also violative of section 20 of the enabling act of June 20, 1910, which provides in substance that the constitution of Arizona shall be republican in form and shall make no distinction in civil or political rights on account of race or color, and shall not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States and the principles of the Declaration of Independence.

Section 4 of Article IV of the Constitution is a restatement in slightly different language of the substance of a proviso in Article IV of the Ordinance of 1787 for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the Ohio River, requiring that the constitutions and government of the States carved out of this territory and admitted by their delegates into the Congress shall be republican and in conformity to the principles contained in said articles.

The provision of the enabling act with reference to the admission of Arizona is a reenactment, first, of the provision covering the admission of new States adopted by the Constitutional Congress on the 13th of July, 1787, and, second, of section 4 of Article IV of the Constitution of the United States, as it was finally ratified by the Thirteen Colonies.

The territory embraced within the limits of Arizona is a part of the territory ceded to the United States by Mexico under the terms of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo on February 2, 1848, and a part of what is known as the Gadsden Purchase of 1852, and there is no limitation or restriction placed upon the Congress of the United States in either the treaty or the agreement of purchase as to the admission of this acquired territory into the Union.

In the Louisiana Purchase, however, the duty is imposed that States carved out of the territory shall be admitted to the Union under the terms of the Constitution. It has been assumed without question, even in the absence of such treaty stipulation, that all territory acquired by the United States, whether under treaty or otherwise, can only be admitted to the Union upon a compliance with the provisions of the Constitution and the requirements of the ordinance of 1787, which became a compact between the several States of the Union at the time of its adoption with reference to the territory then owned by them, and which was practically ceded to the United States to be later admitted in due course to statehood.

In considering the constitution adopted by the people of Arizona, therefore, it will be necessary to consider it in the light of these instruments and the construction placed thereon by all the departments of government, national and State.

The provisions of the Arizona constitution which it is insisted are obnoxious to the Constitution are Articles IV and VIII, establishing as a part of the fundamental law the initiative, the referendum, and the recall. These provisions are as follows:

ARTICLE IV.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

1. Initiative and referendum.

SEC. 1. (1) The legislative authority of the State shall be vested in a legislature, consisting of a senate and a house of representatives, but the people reserve the power to propose laws and amendments to the constitution and to enact or reject such laws and amendments at the polls, independently of the legislature; and they also reserve, for use at their own option, the power to approve or reject at the polls any act, or item, section, or part of any act, of the legislature.

(2) The first of these reserved powers is the initiative. Under this power 10 per cent of the qualified electors shall have the right to propose any measure, and 15 per cent shall have the right to propose any amendment to the constitution.

(3) The second of these reserved powers is the referendum. Under this power the legislature, or 5 per cent of the qualified electors, may order the submission to the people at the polls of any measure, or item, section, or part of any measure, enacted by the legislature, except laws immediately necessary for the preservation of the public peace, health, or safety, or for the support and maintenance of the departments of the State government and State institutions; but to allow opportunity for referendum petitions, no act passed by the legislature shall be operative for 90 days after the close of the session of the legislature enacting such measure, except such as require earlier operation to preserve the public peace, health, or safety, or to provide appropriations for the support and maintenance of the departments of State and of State institutions: Provided, That no such emergency measure shall be considered passed by the legislature unless it shall state in a separate section why it is necessary that it shall become immediately operative, and shall be approved by the affirmative votes of two-thirds of the members elected to each house of the legislature, taken by roll call of ayes and nays, and also approved by the governor; and should such measure be vetoed by the governor, it shall not become a law unless it shall be approved by the votes of three-fourths of the members elected to each house of the legislature, taken by roll call of ayes and nays.

(4) All petitions submitted under the power of the initiative shall be known as initiative petitions, and shall be filed with the secretary of state not less than four months preceding the date of the election at which the measures so proposed are to be voted upon. All petitions submitted under the power of the referendum shall be known as referendum petitions, and shall be filed with the secretary of state not more than 90 days after the final adjournment of the session of the legislature which shall have passed the measure to which the referendum is applied. The filing of a referendum petition against any item, section, or part of any measure shall not prevent the remainder of such measure from becoming operative.

(5) Any measure of amendment to the constitution proposed under the initiative, and any measure to which the referendum is applied, shall be referred to a vote of the qualified electors, and shall become law when approved by a majority of the votes cast thereon and upon proclamation of the governor, and not otherwise.

(6) The veto power of the governor shall not extend to initiative or referendum measures approved by a majority of the qualified electors.

(7) The whole number of votes cast for all candidates for governor at the general election last preceding the filing of any initiative or referendum petition on a State or county measure shall be the basis on which the number of qualified electors required to sign such petition shall be computed.

(8) The powers of the initiative and the referendum are hereby further reserved to the qualified electors of every incorporated city, town, and county as to all local, city, town, or county matters on which such incorporated cities, towns, and counties are or shall be empowered by general laws to legislate. Such incorporated cities, towns, and counties may prescribe the manner of exercising said power within the restrictions of general laws. Under the power of the initiative 15 per cent of the qualified electors may propose measures on such local, city, town, or county matters, and 10 per cent of the electors may propose the referendum on legislation enacted within and by such city, town, or county. Until provided by general law, said cities and towns may prescribe the basis on which said percentages shall be computed.

(9) Every initiative or referendum petition shall be addressed to the secretary of state in the case of petitions for or on State measures, and to the clerk of the board of supervisors, city clerk, or corresponding officer in the case of petitions for or on county, city, or town measures; and shall contain the declaration of each petitioner, for himself, that he is a qualified elector of the State (and in the case of petitions for or on city, town, or county measures, of the city, town, or county affected), his post-office address, the street and number, if any, of his residence, and the date on which he signed such petition. Each sheet containing petitioners' signatures shall be attached to a full and correct copy of the title and text of the measure so proposed to be initiated or referred to the people, and every sheet of every such petition containing signatures shall be verified by the affidavit of the person who circulated said sheet or petition, setting forth that each of the names on said sheet was signed in the presence of the affiant, and that in the belief of the affiant each signer was a qualified elector of the State, or, in the case of a city, town, or county measure, of the city, town, or county affected by the measure so proposed to be initiated or referred to the people.

(10) When any initiative or referendum petition or any measure referred to the people by the legislature shall be filed, in accordance with this section, with the secretary of state, he shall cause to be printed on the official ballot of the next regular general election the title and number of said measure, together with the words "Yes" and "No" in such manner that the electors may express at the polls their approval or disapproval of the measure.

(11) The text of all measures to be submitted shall be published as proposed amendments to the constitution are published, and in submitting such measures and proposed amendments the secretary of state and all other officers shall be guided by the general law until legislation shall be especially provided therefor.

(12) If two or more conflicting measures or amendments to the constitution shall be approved by the people at the same election, the measure or amendment receiving the greatest number of affirmative votes shall prevail in all particulars as to which there is conflict.

(13) It shall be the duty of the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor and the chief justice of the supreme court, to canvass the votes for and against each such measure or proposed amendment to the constitution within 30 days after the election, and upon the completion of the canvass the governor shall forthwith issue a proclamation, giving the whole number of votes cast for and against each measure or proposed amendment, and declaring such measures or amendments as are approved by a majority of those voting thereon to be law.

(14) This section shall not be construed to deprive the legislature of the right to enact any measure.

(15) This section of the constitution shall be, in all respects, self-executing.

SEC. 2. The legislature shall provide a penalty for any willful violation of any of the provisions of the preceding section.

ARTICLE VIII.

REMOVAL FROM OFFICE.

1. Recall of public officers.

SECTION 1. Every public officer in the State of Arizona holding an elective office, either by election or appointment, is subject to recall from such office by the qualified electors of the electoral district from which candidates are elected to such office. Such electoral district may include the whole State. Such number of said electors as shall equal 25 per cent of the number of votes cast at the last preceding general election for all of the candidates for the office held by such officer may by petition, which shall be known as a recall petition, demand his recall.

SEC. 2. Every recall petition must contain a general statement in not more than 200 words of the grounds of such demand, and must be filed in the office in which petitions for nominations to the office held by the incumbent are required to be filed. The signatures to such recall petition need not all be on one sheet of paper, but each signer must add to his signature the date of his signing said petition and his place of residence, giving his street and number, if any, should he reside in a town or city. One of the signers of each sheet of such petition, or the person circulating such sheet, must make and subscribe an oath on said sheet that the signatures thereon are genuine.

SEC. 3. If said officer shall offer his resignation, it shall be accepted, and the vacancy shall be filled as may be provided by law. If he shall not resign within five days after a recall petition is filed, a special election shall be ordered to be held, not less than 20 nor more than 30 days after such order, to determine whether such officer shall be recalled. On the ballots at said election shall be printed the reasons, as set forth in the petition, for demanding his recall, and, in not more than 200 words, the officer's justification of his course in office. He shall continue to perform the duties of his office until the result of said election shall have been officially declared.

SEC. 4. Unless he otherwise request, in writing, his name shall be placed as a candidate on the official ballot without nomination. Other candidates for the office may be nominated to be voted for at said election. The candidate who shall receive the highest number of votes shall be declared elected for the remainder of the term. Unless the incumbent receive the highest number of votes, he shall be deemed to be removed from office, upon qualification of his successor. In the event that his successor shall not qualify within five days after the result of said election shall have been declared, the said office shall be vacant, and may be filled as provided by law.

SEC. 5. No recall petition shall be circulated against any officer until he shall have held his office for a period of six months, except that it may be filed against a member of the legislature at any time after five days from the beginning of the first session after his election. After one recall petition and election, no further recall petition shall be filed against the same officer during the term for which he was elected, unless petitioners signing such petition shall first pay into the public treasury, which has paid such election expenses, all expenses of the preceding election.

SEC. 6. The general election laws shall apply to recall elections in so far as applicable. Laws necessary to facilitate the operation of the provisions of this article shall be enacted, including provision for payment by the public treasury of the reasonable special election campaign expenses of such officer.

Is there anything in these provisions violative either of the letter or the spirit of the Constitution or, if you please, of the terms of the enabling act? If not, nothing remains for Congress to determine except the single question whether the necessary conditions exist in Arizona as to area, productivity, capacity, population, and the loyalty and good disposition of her people. As to this latter proposition no objection has been raised, and I shall confine myself to a discussion of the question whether the constitution of Arizona does in any respect violate section 4 of Article IV of the Constitution of the United States; and I maintain, first, that no argument can be found, either in reason or by analogy, that makes the Arizona constitution providing for the initiative, referendum, and recall obnoxious to this or any provision of the Constitution of the United States; second, that these provisions are but the reservation of powers in a written constitution which have been exercised in this country from the earliest colonial times, and the exercise of them has been recognized as constitutional by the legislative, judicial, and executive branches of the Government, both State and National.

In ascertaining what the framers of the Constitution meant when they declared that Congress should guarantee to every State a republican form of government, resort must be had to the conditions which surrounded the administration of the governments of the several Colonies as well as to contemporaneous and subsequent discussion and judicial decision.

There was nothing which preceded the Constitutional Convention that could have caused the framers of what Gladstone declared "the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man" to fear to intrust the people of the States that might thereafter be admitted to the Union with the power of governing themselves, of enacting their own laws, whether directly or by representatives or by the union of both. Both of these systems, separately and in combination, were in vogue in the Colonies at the adoption of the Constitution, and had been since the earliest settlement of New England. The Revolutionary War had been fought to a successful conclusion by the participation of Colonies some of which were practically governed by the people without more than the form of representative governments. If in framing the constitutional provision under discussion its framers feared to intrust the people with all power, why did they not go further and enjoin, as a condition of admission to the Union, a modification of the Constitution and laws of the Colonies to the idea that the people could not be trusted?

A fair consideration of contemporary literature and discussion will lead to the inevitable conclusion that the fear that animated the framers of the Constitution was not the fear of the mob spirit which we hear so much about in these days, it was not the fear that the people were incapable of self-government or that they could not be trusted to legislate for themselves, but it was a fear that attempts might later be made to establish forms of government with aristocratic or monarchical tendencies, and to protect them from domestic insurrection or foreign invasion.

The Declaration of Independence itself contains the severest possible arraignment of the despotism of a monarchy, and expresses absolute confidence in the people. There is no suggestion in that remarkable document that the people themselves were incapable of self-government; on the contrary, one of its most frequently quoted provisions is that wherein it is stated as a self-evident truth—that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these things it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it and to institute new government, laying its foundations on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

To establish and maintain a government deriving its just powers from the consent of the governed the Revolution was fought. It was a battle for individual rights and individual liberty against the despotism of monarchy, and emerging from the smoke of battle the framers of the Constitution could only have had in mind the establishment of a republican form of government deriving its just powers from the consent of the governed as contradistinguished from a monarchical form. It was upon this theory that one of the resolutions submitted to the convention by Edmund Randolph, of Virginia, was, after some slight amendments, unanimously adopted declaring it the duty of Congress to guarantee to every State a republican form of government.

As further tending to prove that this was the object and purpose of the framers of the Constitution let us recur to the letter of Madison in The Federalist, edited by him in conjunction with Hamilton and Jay. In discussing the provision of the Constitution now under consideration he says:

To guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of government, to protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the legislature or of the executive (when the legislature can not be convened) against domestic violence.

In a confederacy founded on republican principles and composed of republican members the superintending government ought clearly to possess authority to defend the system against aristocratic or monarchical innovations. The more intimate the nature of such a union may be the greater interest have the members in the political institutions of each other, and the greater right to insist that the forms of government under which the compact was entered into should be substantially maintained. But a right implies a remedy; and where else could the remedy be deposited than where it is deposited by the Constitution? Governments of dissimilar principles and forms have been found less adapted to a Federal coalition of any sort than those of kindred nature. * * * But the authority extends no further than to a guaranty of a republican form of government, which supposes a preexisting government of the form which is to be guaranteed. As long, therefore, as the existing republican forms are continued by the States they are guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. Whenever the States may choose to substitute other republican forms they have a right to do so and to claim the Federal guaranty for the latter. The only restriction imposed on them is that they shall not exchange republican for antirepublican constitutions, a restriction which, it is presumed, will hardly be considered as a grievance. (Letter No. 43.)

This letter was addressed to the people of the State of New York at a time when the ratification of the Constitution by that State was under consideration, and by a distinguished member of the Constitutional Convention. Here is a distinct declaration of the purposes of the convention to authorize Congress to defend the system of government provided for by the Constitution against aristocratic or monarchical innovations and a right of any State at any time to substitute other republican forms of government not inconsistent with the general plan and their right to claim a Federal guaranty for the latter, the only restriction being that no State should exchange a republican for an antirepublican constitution.

This statement, by so distinguished a statesman and one who was entirely familiar with the differing conditions and forms of government in the Thirteen Colonies prior to and at the time when the Constitution was being framed in convention, is entitled to the greatest weight in attempting to arrive at the purposes of the convention in framing the section thereof under consideration; and it must therefore be taken in connection with the conditions and forms of government as they existed in the Colonies before and at the time of the convention.

In this connection it is proper to call attention to some of the constitutions and bills of rights of the Colonies prior to the formation of the Federal Constitution.

The North Carolina bill of rights of 1776 declares:

1. That all political power is vested in and derived from the people only.

The Virginia bill of rights of 1776 declares:

SECTION 1. That all men are by nature equal, free, and independent, and have certain inherent rights, of which, when they enter into a state of society, they can not by any compact deprive or divest their posterity, namely, the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the means of acquiring and possessing property and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety.

SEC. 2. That all power is vested in, and consequently derived from, the people.

The Maryland bill of rights of 1776 says:

1. That all government of right originates from the people, is founded in compact only, and instituted solely for the good of the whole.

The Pennsylvania bill of rights of 1776 declares:

III. That the people of this State have the sole, exclusive, and inherent right of governing and regulating the internal police of the same.

The New York bill of rights of 1777 declares:

I. This convention, therefore, in the name and by the authority of the good people of this State, doth ordain, determine, and declare that no authority shall, on any pretense whatever, be exercised over the people or members of this State but such as shall be derived from and granted by them.

The Connecticut constitution of 1777 declares:

That the ancient form of civil government, contained in the charter from Charles the Second, King of England, and adopted by the people of this State, shall be and remain the civil constitution of this State, under the sole authority of the people thereof, independent of any king or prince whatever. And that this Republic is, and shall forever be and remain, a free, sovereign, and independent State, by the name of the State of Connecticut.

The first constitution submitted in Massachusetts was rejected by the people by direct vote at town meetings in the spring of 1779, because it contained no bill of rights, and for other reasons. The next constitution submitted, that of 1780, the people adopted by direct vote at town meetings and by more than two-thirds of all who voted. The bill of rights declares:

ARTICLE I. All men are born free and equal, and have certain natural, essential, and inalienable rights; among which may be reckoned the right of enjoying and defending their lives and liberties; that of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property; in fine, that of seeking and obtaining their safety and happiness.

ART. IV. The people of this Commonwealth have the sole and exclusive right of governing themselves as a free, sovereign, and independent State, and do, and forever shall, exercise and enjoy every power, jurisdiction, and right which is not, or may not hereafter be, by them expressly delegated to the United States of America in Congress assembled.

In New Hampshire four constitutions were submitted to the people, who voted directly upon them at town meetings. The first three were rejected (American Political Science Review, Vol. II, p. 549), largely because there were no express limitations upon the power of the legislature—no bill of rights. The bill of rights of the fourth one, that of 1784, declares:

VII. The people of this State have the sole and exclusive right of governing themselves as a free, sovereign, and independent State, and do, and forever hereafter shall, exercise and enjoy every power, jurisdiction, and right pertaining thereto which is not or may not hereafter be by them expressly delegated to the United States of America in Congress assembled.

The Vermont constitution of 1777 declares:

IV. That the people of this State have the sole, exclusive, and inherent right of governing and regulating the internal police of the same.

The New Jersey constitution of 1776 declares:

Whereas all the constitutional authority ever possessed by the Kings of Great Britain over these Colonies or their other dominions was, by compact, derived from the people and held of them for the common interest of the whole society, allegiance and protection are, in the nature of things, reciprocal ties, each equally depending upon the other and liable to be dissolved by the others being refused or withdrawn. And whereas George III, King of Great Britain, has refused protection to the good people of these Colonies, and, by assenting to sundry acts of the British Parliament, attempted to subject them to the absolute dominion of that body, and has also made war upon them in the most cruel and unnatural manner for no other cause than asserting their just rights, all civil authority under him is necessarily at an end and a dissolution of government in each Colony has consequently taken place.

The South Carolina constitution of 1776 declares:

I. That this congress, being a full and free representation of the people of this Colony, shall henceforth be deemed and called the General Assembly of South Carolina, and as such shall continue until the 21st day of October next, and no longer.

The Georgia constitution of 1777 declares:

We, therefore, the representatives of the people, from whom all power originates, and for whose benefit all government is intended, by virtue of the power delegated to us, do ordain and declare, and it is hereby ordained and declared, that the following rules and regulations be adopted for the future government of this State.

It will be seen from these excerpts from the bills of rights and constitutions of the several Colonies, each and all of which must have been in the minds of the framers of the Federal Constitution, that, far from entertaining any fear of the people, there was an expression of absolute confidence in them in each of the Colonies as the source from which all power had its origin. Many of the Colonies had been governed as pure democracies, the people legislating directly at town meetings held for that purpose and electing as well as instructing those who were to assist in administering the laws of their own making.

The representative idea was one of gradual evolution. There was no sudden change from a pure democracy to a representative form of government. There has never been a time when the governments, either of the Colonies or the States, were entirely representative. On the contrary, with the gradual trend toward the representative system the direct system remained intact for many years after the adoption of the Constitution, and it has never yet been entirely abolished in any of the States. Always the tendency was, even in the most typically representative forms of government, to make the representatives or agents of the people directly responsive to the popular will. I shall show later that so long as these representatives or agents of the people were acting in truth and in fact as their representatives, the people were satisfied with the transference of a part of the power which they had formerly exercised under constitutional limitations and restrictions to representatives, but when these agents began to reach a point where they ignored the popular will, were no longer responsive thereto, but responded rather to the dictation of the political machine and the corrupt party boss, the pendulum began to swing in the opposite direction, and checks began to be devised against legislative and representative usurpation. What was once, in part at least, a representative form of government, has become a misrepresentative form of government, and in a determination to correct this the initiative, the referendum, and the recall had their origin.

The Arizona constitution and the constitutions of other States from which it was copied are not an enlargement of the powers which were exercised by the people of the Colonies in the regulation of their affairs, but it is a resumption or rather the assertion of powers which had become dormant by nonuse, by embodying them in the fundamental law—the written constitution. If there be any difference the powers of the people under the colonial forms of government were more ample and more frequently used for restraining the acts of their representatives than any power attempted to be reserved to or exercised by the people of Arizona under the constitution to which objection is now made.

I have undertaken briefly to call attention to conditions as they existed in the Colonies prior to the adoption of the Constitution and to contemporaneous interpretation of the provision now under consideration as to its purposes and as to the intent of its framers. Let us look now at the interpretation placed upon it by later text writers and courts.

Sutherland, in his Notes on the United States Constitution (p 603), says that—

The distinguishing feature of the republican form of government is the right of the people to choose their own officers for governmental administration and to pass their own laws; by virtue of the legislative power reposed in representative bodies and by the adoption of a constitution the people limit their own power as against the sudden impulses of mere majorities. The State here referred to is a member of the Union, an organized people or a community of free citizens, occupying a definite territory. The provision does not undertake to designate any particular government as republican, nor is the exact form in any manner especially indicated.

Justice Story, in his work on the Constitution (Vol. II, sec. 1814), in giving the reasons for this provision of the Constitution, says:

The want of a provision of this nature was felt as a capital defect in the plan of the confederation, as it might in its consequences endanger, if not overthrow, the Union. Without a guaranty the assistance to be derived from a national government in repairing domestic dangers which might threaten the existence of the State constitutions could not be demanded as a right from the National Government. Usurpation might raise its standard and trample upon the liberties of the people, while the National Government could legally do nothing more than behold the encroachment with indignation and regret. A successful faction might erect a tyranny on the ruins of order and law, while no succor could be constitutionally afforded by the Union to the friends and supporters of the Government. But this is not all; the destruction of the National Government itself or of neighboring States might result from a successful rebellion in a single State.

It will thus be seen that this eminent jurist did not suggest that there was any fear on the part of the framers of the Constitution that there was danger to be apprehended from the people because of the exercise of those powers which were inherent in them as sovereigns, or that the exercise of legislative or other power by them would make their Government unrepublican in form. The reasons given by him for the enactment of the constitutional provision were based on the dangers to be apprehended from internal usurpation or external invasion—in other words, the establishment through these instrumentalities of a form of government inconsistent with those which were in force in the Colonies at the time of the adoption of the Constitution.

This view is further strengthened by Judge Story in section 1815, where he says:

That the Federalist has spoken with so much force and propriety upon this subject that it supersedes all further reasoning—and then quotes the letter of Mr. Madison to the people of New York, which is heretofore referred to at length. Adopting the reasoning of that letter as his own, he states, after quoting it at length:

It may not be amiss further to observe (in the language of another commentator) that every pretext for intermeddling with the domestic concerns of any State under color of protecting it against domestic violence is taken away by that part of the provision which renders an application from the legislature or executive authority of the State in danger necessary to be made to the General Government before this interference can be at all proper. On the other hand, this article becomes an immense acquisition of strength and additional force to the aid of any State government in case of an internal rebellion or insurrection against lawful authority.

Here again is the suggestion that Congress can not take the initiative, even in cases of domestic violence. The initiative must be taken and the application made by the legislative or executive authority of the State.

Mr. George Ticknor Curtis, in his Constitutional History of the United States (Vol. I, p. 363), states:

> The object of this provision was to secure to the people of each State the power of governing their community through the action of a majority, according to the fundamental rules which they might prescribe for ascertaining the public will.

Nowhere have I been able to find a suggestion that this provision was intended to curb the people in the adoption of constitutions and in the enactment of laws, whether directly or indirectly, within the several States which might seem to them best to conserve and preserve their liberties and their rights. They have the undoubted right at any time to change their fundamental law to suit their own needs, so long as the form of government adopted by them is republican in form.

That distinguished Democrat and authority on constitutional law, John Randolph Tucker, in his work on the United States (Vol. II, sec. 311), says:

> The word "guarantee" does not mean "to form," "to establish," "to create"; it means "to warrant," "to secure," "to protect" the State—that is, the body politic—in its right to have a republican form of government. It defends the people against the interference of any foreign power or of any intestine conspiracy against its right as a body politic to establish for itself republican forms of government. To allow the guarantor to take the initiative and, under the pretext of its duty as guarantor, to impose a form of government upon the people of a State would make this clause, intended for protection, an excuse for destructive invasion. No occasion for the exercise of this important yet dangerous power has ever arisen except as the result of civil war.

The supreme court of Oklahoma, whose constitution is substantially the same as that of the proposed constitution of Arizona, in ex parte Wagner (21 Okla., 33), sustained the constitution of that State as not obnoxious to the Federal Constitution guaranteeing to every State a republican form of government.

Mr. Justice Wilson, who was a member of the Constitutional Convention and was later a member of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Chisholm v. Georgia (2 Dall., 419), speaking of what constituted a republican form of government, said:

> As a citizen I know the government of that State [Georgia] to be republican, and my short definition of such a government is one constructed on this principle, that the supreme power resides in the body of the people.

It should be remembered in connection with this decision that Mr. Justice Wilson was considered one of the ablest constitutional lawyers in the convention which framed the Constitution, and it was he who proposed the amendment to the resolution of Gov. Randolph which resulted in the unanimous adoption of the section of the Constitution as it now stands.

The Supreme Court of the United States, In re Duncan (139 U. S., 449), holds that the distinguishing feature of a republican form of government is the right of the people to choose officers for governmental administration and to pass their own laws; and in Miner v. Happersett (21 Wall., 162), in speaking of this provision of the Constitution, says:

> It is true that the United States guarantees to every State a republican form of government. * * * No particular government is designated as republican, neither is the exact form to be guaranteed in any manner especially designated. * * * The guaranty necessarily implies the duty on the part of the States themselves to supply such a government. All the States had governments when the Constitution was adopted. * * * These governments the Constitution did not change. They are accepted precisely as they were, and it is therefore to be presumed that they were such as it was the duty of the States to provide. Thus we have unmistakable evidence of what was republican in form within the meaning of that term as employed in the Constitution.

The supreme court of California, In re Pfahler (150 Cal., 171), where a similar attack was made upon the charter of the city of Los Angeles, held to substantially the same doctrine, overruling former decisions of the court which seemed to maintain a different view.

In Kadderly v. The City of Portland (44 Oreg., 118) the initiative and referendum amendment to the constitution of that State, which is on all fours with the constitution of Arizona, and which was attacked because it violated the provision of the Constitution now under consideration, Mr. Justice Bean, a judge of distinguished ability, who was subsequently appointed one of the United States circuit judges, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

> Nor do we think the amendment void because in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, Article IV, section 4, guaranteeing to every State a republican form of government. The purpose of this provision of the Constitution is to protect the people of the several States against aristocratic and monarchical invasions and against insurrections and domestic violence and to prevent them from abolishing a republican form of government. (Cooley, Const. Lim., 7 ed., 45; 2 Story, Const., 5 ed., sec. 1815.) But it does not forbid them from amending or changing their constitution in any way they may see fit, so long as none of these results is accomplished. No particular style of government is designated in the Constitution as republican, nor is its exact form in any way prescribed. A republican form of government is a government administered by representatives chosen or appointed by the people or by their authority. Mr. Madison says it is "a government which derives all its powers directly or indirectly from the great body of the people, and is administered by persons holding their offices during pleasure, for a limited period, or during good behavior." (The Federalist, 302.) And in discussing the section of the Constitution of the United States now under consideration he says: "But the authority extends no further than a guaranty of a republican form of government, which supposes a preexisting government of the form which is to be guaranteed by the Federal Constitution. Whenever the States may choose to substitute other republican forms, they have a right to do so, and to claim the Federal guaranty for the latter. The only restriction imposed on them is that they shall not exchange republican for antirepublican constitutions." (The Federalist, 342.) Now, the initiative and referendum amendment does not abolish or destroy the republican form of government or substitute another in its place. The representative character of the government still remains. The people have simply reserved to themselves a larger share of legislative power, but they have not overthrown the republican form of the government or substituted another in its place. The government is still divided into the legislative, executive, and judicial departments, the duties of which are discharged by representatives selected by the people.
> 8. Under this amendment, it is true, the people may exercise a legislative power, and may, in effect, veto or defeat bills passed and approved by the legislature and the governor; but the legislative and executive departments are not destroyed, nor are their powers or authority materially curtailed. Laws proposed and enacted by the people under the initiative clause of the amendment are subject to the same constitutional limitations as other statutes, and may be amended or repealed by the legislature at will.

In the case of Kiernan v. City of Portland (111 Pac. Rep., 379) the same court, speaking through Judge King, again upheld the Oregon system of direct legislation as not obnoxious to the Constitution of the United States, and, amongst other things, say:

> It is difficult to conceive of any system of lawmaking coming nearer to the great body of the people of the entire State, or by those comprising the various municipalities, than that now in use here, and being so we are at a loss to understand how the adoption and use of this system can be held a departure from a republican form of government. It was to escape the oppression resulting from governments controlled by the select few, so often ruling under the assumption that "might makes right," that gave birth to republics. Monarchical rulers refuse to recognize their accountability to the people governed by them. In a republic the converse is the rule; the tenure of office may be for a short or a long period, or even for life, yet those in office are at all times answerable, either directly or indirectly, to the people, and in proportion to their responsibility to those for whom they may be the public agents, and the nearer the power to enact laws and control public servants lies with the great body of the people, the more nearly does a government take unto itself the form of a republic—not in name alone, but in fact. From this it follows that each republic may differ in its political system, or in the political machinery by which it moves, but so long as the ultimate control of its officials and affairs of state remains in its citizens it will, in the eye of all republics, be recognized as a government of that class. Of this we have many examples in Central and South America.
> It becomes, then, a matter of degree, and the fear manifested by the briefs filed in this case would seem to indicate, not that we are drifting from the secure moorings of a republic, but that our State, by the direct system of legislation complained of, is becoming too democratic, advancing too rapidly toward a republic pure in form. This, it is true, counsel for petitioner does not concede, but under any interpretation of which the term is capable, or from any view thus far found expressed in the writings of the prominent statesmen who were members of the Constitutional Convention, or who figured in the early upbuilding of the Nation, it follows that the system here assailed brings us nearer to a State republican in form than before its adoption.

In the case of Hopkins v. The City of Duluth (81 Minn., 189) the charter of Duluth had been submitted to the direct vote of the citizens and adopted. It was subsequently assailed because it was violative of section 4 of Article IV of the Federal Constitution. This contention was not sustained, and the court held:

> The provision referred to provides that "the United States shall guarantee to every State a republican form of government and protect them from invasion," etc. The purpose of this guaranty was to protect a union founded upon republican principles against aristocratic and monarchical invasions. * * * It will be admitted, however, that this State can not supplant its republican form of government by "aristocratic and monarchical invasions" upon principles inherent in the nature of a government, but it may change its constitution in any way consistent with its own fundamental law; and we are unable to see the force of the suggestion that the amendment of 1898 is not republican in form as well as in spirit. It is true that, by the submission of charters and amendments to municipalities in the manner provided for by the amendment, a change is effected, but it is a change that by every historical sanction from the earliest times is republican in form and essence. The Federal as well as the State government is representative in character, and the people do not directly vote upon the adoption of the laws by which they are governed. Yet it can not be said that, if they were able to do so, a provision to effectuate that purpose would not be republican. * * * The test of republican or democratic government is the will of the people, expressed in majorities, under the proper forms of law. Every proposal for a change of government must of necessity be submitted, either directly or indirectly, through a designated origin, whether it be upon the motion of one or of more persons, upon the instance of an individual citizen or a number; but so long as the ultimatum of decision is left to the will of the people at the ballot box it is essentially republican, and the theoretical distinction urged by the learned counsel for the contestee practically amounts to no more than the argument that the change provided for is new and radical. It may turn out that the amendment is beneficial or otherwise, yet its tendencies are clearly republican, and must be upheld by this court.

The coordinate branches of the National Government—the executive, legislative, and judicial—as well as those of the State governments, have recognized that the government proposed to be established under the Arizona constitution is republican in form. The Arizona constitution is almost in ipsis verbis of the constitutions of Oregon, Montana, South Dakota, and Oklahoma, in each of which the popular initiative and the optional referendum, and in some of them the recall, make more effective the voice of the people and operate as checks and balances against legislative malfeasance, corruption, and misrule.

Oklahoma was admitted to the Union with these provisions in the constitution, and Congress recognized that it was republican in form by admitting it to the Union, and the President by proclamation, carrying out the resolution of Congress in that behalf, declared that the constitution of Oklahoma was republican in form.

And again, after the adoption by the people of Oregon, Montana, and South Dakota of amendments to their constitutions putting into effect the provisions which it is claimed are obnoxious to the Federal Constitution, the Senators and the Representatives from these States, as well as from Oklahoma, have been admitted to their seats without question; and this constituted a recognition by Congress that these States had republican forms of government.

Sutherland, in the work referred to, restates, at page 604, a well-established rule on this subject when he says that:

> Recognition of a State government, as well as its republican character, is necessarily implied from the admission of its Senators and Representatives to seats in Congress, citing United States v. Rhodes (47 Fed. Cases, 16151), White v. Hart (13 Wall., 646), Luther v. Borden (7 How., 1) as authority for the doctrine enunciated in the text.

Legislative and executive interpretations are entitled to great weight, under well-established rules of law, in construing statutes and constitutions.

I maintain that the standard by which the Congress is to determine whether or not the constitution presented by a people asking admission as a State is that the constitution shall conform in its essential details to the governments that were in existence at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and, applying that as the rule and guide of action, the constitution presented by the people of Arizona is republican in form because it is conformable in all essential details to the forms of government and methods of administration in many, at least, of the Colonies at the time of the adoption of the Constitution.

If a higher duty than this devolves upon the Congress of the United States, where is that duty to begin and end? If they have power to take the initiative and, taking the constitution of Arizona by its four corners, modeled as it has been after the constitutions which are in force in older States, say that it is not republican in form, can the Congress then go further and demand that those States which have constitutions amended and are now exact counterparts of the Arizona constitution shall amend these constitutions again, shall undo the work of the constitutional conventions, shall nullify laws that have been enacted by legislature and people, because the Congress of the United States is of the opinion that these particular constitutions are not republican in form?

How is the Congress to exercise this power of nullifying the constitutions of these States? Where is the modus operandi pointed out in the Constitution? Is it to be done by an act of Congress, or is it to be done by the declaration of war against a State that refuses to nullify its constitution and to adopt one that may be consonant with the views of Congress as to what, in its opinion, constitutes a republican form of government? The suggestion of the proposition carries its own refutation, and Congress has no such power.

If Congress determines that the constitution adopted by the people of Arizona is not republican in form because of the provisions in regard to the initiative, the referendum, and the recall, what does Congress intend to do with reference to South Dakota, Oregon, Montana, Arkansas, and a number of the older States which have amended their constitutions in these respects since their admission to the Union; and what is it to do with reference to Oklahoma, whose constitution has met the approval of Congress, of the President, and the court of last resort in that State?

Having discussed the intent of the framers of the Constitution with reference to section 4 of Article IV of the Constitution in the light of contemporaneous discussion and subsequent executive, legislative, and judicial interpretation, I desire to show that there is nothing new in the initiative, the referendum, and the recall to which objection is now made, and in the discussion of this question I do not deem it necessary to trace the genesis of either or to show the method of their development and application in any of the Old World governments. I shall confine myself to our own country, where abundant warrant can be found to sustain the position that the doctrine embodied in the Arizona constitution is not a new one.

And, first, as to the initiative. It will be observed that no attempt is made to abolish the Legislature of Arizona under the provisions of the Constitution; it is left intact, with all the powers that are usually given to the legislative body under the provisions of the constitutions of the other States of the Union. To that extent, therefore, the government sought to be established, in so far as the legislature is concerned, is distinctly representative in form, but the people reserve to themselves two distinct powers and point out the mode and manner of the exercise thereof, one of which it might truthfully be said is for the correction of sins of omission and the other for the correction of those of commission, namely: First, they reserve to themselves the power to initiate laws and, concurrently with the legislature, to enact or reject by their vote such laws as may be so proposed; second, they reserve to themselves the power, at their option and upon proper steps being first taken, to have referred to them for approval or rejection any law or laws passed by the legislature. The system proposed by the Arizona constitution, and which, as I have stated, is modeled after the amended constitutions of Oregon and other of the older States, is not unlike the system of government that was in vogue in New England at and prior to the time of the adoption of the Constitution. There the people legislated directly upon local affairs, whilst in State affairs legislation was through a legislative assembly directly elected, each member of which was under instructions given by his constituents at special town meetings, which could be at any time called by the selectmen or any 10 citizens. In other of the Colonies legislation was had by the legislative assembly and by county governments, and in both cases the members were instructed at county conferences or mass meetings of the citizens.

I have already referred to and quoted from the bills of rights and constitutions of a number of the States antedating the adoption of the Constitution to show that sovereignty resided in the people, and that this fact was of necessity in the minds of those who subscribed to the Declaration of Independence when they declared—> that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed—as well as in the minds of those who framed the Federal Constitution. These constitutions, the Declaration of Independence, and the Constitution of the United States, recognize to the fullest extent the right of the people to govern themselves.

The power of the people under the initiative system takes the place of the power exercised by the colonists in New England of legislating directly and of instructing their delegates to the legislature—a power which, though exercised in the earlier days of the Republic, has been gradually abandoned under the party system. It is but a revival of that system, and in many States has become a part of the written constitutions.

The time was when the citizen instructed the delegates to the legislative bodies and the officers who were to administer the laws, but under the party and convention system there has been an abandonment of this salutary rule, and instead of the people instructing their delegates and the officers who are to administer the law these instructions come now from the political machine and corrupt party boss. There has been a complete reversal of the forms of government in vogue in the earlier days of the Republic, and it is because of this that it has been found necessary for the people to resume, or rather to reassert in a written constitution, a right and power which in days gone by they were wont to exercise, but which they have unconsciously and gradually ceased to use. This power is now to be exercised again under the initiative system, and where the representatives in the legislative assemblies ignore the will of the people and listen, rather, to those who in many cases have become the representatives of a corrupt party system, and of those who are wont to clamor at the legislative halls for legislation in behalf of special interests, the people themselves can, upon their own initiative, enact laws in the interest of the whole people and can, under the power reserved to them through the referendum, defeat legislation which is hostile to the public interest.

Nor must it be forgotten that laws enacted by the people are subject in the final analysis to legislative control, because, as was held in the case of Kadderly v. The City of Portland (to which I have heretofore referred), the legislature has power to amend and to repeal any law enacted under the initiative system.

Further than that, it would be within the power of the legislature under the Arizona system, as it has been held to be within the power of the legislature and the executive under the Oregon constitution, to defeat a referendum upon a law passed by the legislature by the declaration of an emergency in the statute that the public peace, health, and safety demanded that it should go into effect at once. Such an emergency declared to an act passed by the legislature, when not vetoed by the executive, is beyond the reach of the people under the referendum system. The legislature is the sole judge as to whether or not an emergency shall be declared, and though there is some conflict of opinion the weight of authority is that the courts of the country can not interfere with that legislative right; so that in the final analysis the power reserved to the people under the initiative system and under the power of the referendum is but a method of expressing the will of the people, a method of instructing their representatives to the legislature, and a method of showing disapproval of their conduct in the enactment of laws which have not for their purpose the common good. No more perfect system of checks against the improvident or improper use of power, whether by the legislature or the people, was ever devised than the system now under discussion.

The system of government therefore proposed under this constitution is a mixed government, a representative government in combination with direct legislation, and it is none the less a republican form of government, because there is perfect cooperation between the legislative or representative body and the people acting directly.

Irrespective of the particular language used in the Arizona constitution reserving to the people the power of directly enacting laws and of taking a referendum on legislation passed by the legislature, both of these powers have been from time immemorial exercised by the people of the older States. Most, if not all, of the new States admitted to the Union have by direct vote of the people adopted their constitutions, whether acting pursuant to enabling acts which expressly directed this to be done or upon their own initiative. These constitutions are sometimes more than mere fundamentals of government. Many of them contain express provisions which are self-acting and need no further legislation to put them into effect. The adoption of these constitutions by direct vote of the people, containing, as many of them do, provisions regulating the duties of the citizen and the rights of property, are just as much direct legislation as if they had been enacted under just such limitations and restrictions as are contained in the constitution of Arizona. No suggestion has ever been made at any time that because these fundamental laws have been enacted by a direct vote of the people that they are therefore unrepublican and ought not to be admitted to the Union. There can be no distinction between such legislation and legislation which might hereafter be enacted by the people under the provisions of the Arizona constitution, and which has heretofore been enacted by the people under the constitutions of Oregon and Oklahoma.

Let us look at some of the constitutions which have contained general legislation and which the courts have sustained as sufficient without additional legislation to make them effective.

Section 4 of Article XVI of the constitution of Pennsylvania adopted in 1873 provides as to how the shareholders may vote in the election of directors of a corporation.

Section 5 provides that all incorporations must have known place of business and an agent.

Section 7 provides that corporations shall not issue stock or bonds except under certain limitations, and that all fictitious increase of stock shall be void.

Article XVII regulates railroads and canals and provides among other things for the right of railroads to construct railroads across the State, and the right of one railroad to connect with or cross another railroad, and the duty of the railroad to receive passengers from other railroads. Also, that every railroad or canal corporation shall maintain an office where transfer of its stock shall be made, and its books shall be kept for inspection by stockholders and creditors, and so forth.

Section 8 of this article provides that there shall be no free passes issued except to officers and employees of the company. And there are many other similar provisions.

Now, note that. It is just as much direct legislation as if it had been enacted by a legislature or if it had been enacted by the people under the initiative system of legislation. It is just as complete and as active.

The constitution of New Jersey, 1844, Article I, section 5, provides:

> In all prosecutions or indictments for libel the truth may be given in evidence to the jury. And if it shall appear to the jury that the matter charged as libelous is true and was published with good motives and justifiable ends, the party shall be acquitted.

And the same provision is contained in many other constitutions.

Article XIII of the constitution of Illinois adopted in 1870 regulates warehouses. Among other provisions, section 4 is as follows:

> All railroad companies and other common carriers on railroads shall weigh and measure grain at points where it is shipped and receipt for the full amount, and shall be responsible for the delivery of such amount to the owner or the consignee thereof at the place of destination.

Section 6 of Article XI provides:

> That every stockholder in a railroad corporation or institution shall be individually responsible and liable to its creditors over and above the amount of stock by him or her held to an amount equal to his or her respective shares so held.

Substantially the same provision is contained in the constitutions of Iowa, Indiana, Washington, and other States.

Section 2 of Article XV of the constitution of Kansas adopted in 1855 prohibited lotteries in that State. Many other States have the same provision.

Section 6 of Article XV of the constitution of Kansas adopted in 1857 provides that—

> All property, both real and personal, of the wife owned or claimed by marriage and that acquired afterwards by gift, devise, or consent, shall be her separate property.

Section 9 of Article XV of the constitution of Kansas, 1859, provides:

> A homestead to the extent of 160 acres of farming land or of 1 acre within the limits of an incorporated town or city, occupied as a residence by the family of the owner, shall be exempt from officer's sale under any process of law, etc.

Similar provisions exist in many other States.

The constitution of Washington regulates corporations in great detail. Section 191 prohibits pooling; section 193 prohibits the consolidation of railroads; section 194, that railroad stock shall be considered personalty; section 197 prohibits passes; section 198 provides for the rights of express companies on railroads; and so forth.

Section 3 of Article IX of the constitution of Wyoming provides:

> No boy under the age of 14 years and no woman or girl of any age shall be permitted to be in or about any dangerous mine, etc.

Section 4 of Article IX provides for the liability for violation of the preceding section; and section 6 of Article X provides that no corporation shall have power to engage in more than one general line of business; Article X also regulates railroads and telegraph lines in detail; section 12 of Article XV provides for an exemption from taxation of churches, public cemeteries, and so forth; section 1 of Article XIX provides that eight hours shall constitute a lawful day's work in all lines. That article also provides that certain contracts with laborers shall be unlawful.

I have shown that legislation by direct vote of the people has been expressly authorized by and enacted in the constitutions of a number of the States and the power recognized by Congress. I shall now undertake to show that the power reserved under the referendum clause of the Arizona constitution has been reserved by the constitution of nearly every State in the Union, has been recognized by Congress as a valid reservation of power, and has been exercised as well by Congress itself. It has been exercised by the States under constitutional authority in matters affecting localities in the States, as well as in matters affecting the whole State.

And, first, as to those affecting the States at large. One of the earliest constitutional provisions for a referendum is to be found in Article I, section 23, of the constitution of Georgia (1798), which is as follows:

> And this convention doth further declare and assert that all the territory within the present temporary line, and within the limits aforesaid, is now, of right, the property of the free citizens of the State and held by them in sovereignty inalienable, but by their consent.

At the time of the adoption of the New York constitution in 1846 the question of extending the right of suffrage to the negroes was referred to the people, and a like provision was made in the Michigan constitution in 1850. The constitutions of Wisconsin (1848), Kansas (1858), Colorado (1876), South Dakota (1889), Washington (1889), and North Dakota (1895) contain provisions for a referendum of questions affecting suffrage, leaving it absolutely and entirely to a vote of the majority of the people as to whether these provisions should be operative or not. The constitution of Rhode Island (1842) provides that the general assembly shall have no power without the express consent of the people to incur debts in excess of $50,000, nor shall they in any case without such consent pledge the faith of the State for the payment of the obligations of others.

The constitutions of Michigan (1843), New Jersey (1844), New York and Iowa (1846), Illinois (1848), California (1849), Kentucky (1850), Kansas (1859), Nebraska (1866), Missouri (1875), Colorado (1876), Louisiana (1879), Idaho, Montana, Washington, and Wyoming (1889), and South Carolina (1895) have adopted measures providing for a referendum involving the creation of debts on behalf of these States or the pledging of the credit thereof. The State of Texas, in its constitution of 1845, provided for the permanent establishment of the seat of government by vote of the people at an election the time, place, and conduct of which was fixed by the constitution. Numerous States followed the example set by Texas and adopted substantially the same provision with reference to the location of the State capital.

Following the same course, the State of Iowa, in its constitution of 1846, provided that no act of the general assembly authorizing or creating corporations or associations with banking powers should take effect or be in force until submitted to the people at a general or special election and by a majority of them approved. Illinois, Wisconsin, Michigan, Ohio, Kansas, and Missouri followed with constitutional provisions of substantially the same character.

Innumerable instances might be cited showing that legislation with reference to the sale of school lands, that relating to State aid to railways, to taxation, the location of State universities, the extension of suffrage, and appropriations for State purposes was required by constitutional provision to be submitted to the voters of the State for approval or rejection.

The second class of constitutional provisions providing for a referendum are those which affect local governments, and within this class come a great variety of subjects. The first provision of this kind is to be found in the constitution of Tennessee of 1834, where the people reserved to themselves the right to cooperate in acts of government involving the change of county lines. Section 4 of Article X provided that—

> No part of the county shall be taken to form a new county or a part thereof without the consent of a majority of the qualified voters in such part taken off.

Practically the same provision has been embodied in later constitutions of many of the States, some requiring a majority of the electors and some two-thirds as a condition to changing county lines.

Section 5 of Article VIII of the Maryland constitution of 1864 provided that—

> The general assembly shall levy at each regular session after the adoption of the constitution an annual tax of not less than 10 cents on each $100 of taxable property throughout the State for the purpose of free schools: Provided, That the general assembly shall not levy any additional school tax upon particular counties unless such county express by popular vote its desire for such tax.

This provision is not only a provision of initiative legislation on the one part, but contains in the very section a provision for the referendum of the act to the people of the county.

Other States followed with constitutional provisions requiring a referendum on laws increasing the rate of taxation for school purposes. Amongst these were Missouri (1875), Texas (1876), and Florida (1885). Those providing for a referendum to authorize an increased tax rate in counties were Texas (1868), Illinois (1870), Nebraska (1875), West Virginia (1872), Missouri (1875), and Louisiana (1879). The provision in the Missouri constitution specifically fixes the rate which may be imposed upon the people, which can not be increased without the assent of the people, and inasmuch as it is an example of direct legislation, self-executing, as well as an example of the application of the referendum principle, I quote it at length. It is as follows:

> Taxes for county, city, town, and school purposes may be levied on all subjects and objects of taxation, but the valuation of property therefor shall not exceed the valuation of the same property in such town, city, or school district for State and county purposes. For county purposes the annual rate on property in counties having $6,000,000 or less shall not, in the aggregate, exceed 50 cents on the $100 valuation; in counties having $6,000,000 and under $10,000,000 said rate shall not exceed 40 cents on the $100 valuation; in counties having $10,000,000 and under $30,000,000 said rate shall not exceed 50 cents on the $100 valuation; and in counties having $30,000,000 or more said rate shall not exceed 35 cents on the $100 valuation. For city and town purposes the annual rate on the property in cities and towns having 30,000 inhabitants or more shall not, in the aggregate, exceed 100 cents on the $100 valuation; in cities and towns having less than 30,000 and over 10,000 inhabitants said rate shall not exceed 60 cents on the $100 valuation; in cities and towns having less than 10,000 and more than 1,000 inhabitants said rate shall not exceed 50 cents on the $100 valuation; and in towns having 1,000 inhabitants or less said rate shall not exceed 25 cents on the $100 valuation. For school purposes in districts the annual rate on property shall not exceed 40 cents on the $100 valuation: Provided, The aforesaid annual rates for school purposes may be increased in districts formed of cities and towns to an amount not to exceed $1 on the $100 valuation; and in other districts to an amount not to exceed 65 cents on the $100 valuation, on the condition that a majority of the voters who are taxpayers, voting at an election to decide the question, vote for said increase. For the purpose of erecting public buildings in counties, cities, or school districts, the rates of taxation herein limited may be increased when the rate of such an increase and the purpose for which it is intended shall have been submitted to a vote of the people, and two-thirds of the qualified voters of such county, city, or school district voting at such election shall vote therefor. The rate herein allowed to each county shall be ascertained by the amount of taxable property therein, according to the last assessment for State and county purposes, and the rate allowed to each city and town by the number of inhabitants according to the last census taken under the authority of the State or the United States; said restrictions as to rates shall apply to taxes of every kind and description, whether general or special, except taxes to pay valid indebtedness now existing or bonds which may be issued in renewal of such indebtedness.

Provisions are also to be found in the constitutions of many of the States subjecting to a referendum local matters with regard to creating municipal indebtedness and the issuance of bonds, the acquiring of waterworks and plants for light, changing lines of judicial districts, the formation of new courts, and other questions of a purely local character; but I do not deem it necessary to quote at length from the constitutions embodying these provisions, satisfying myself with a mere reference thereto.

The provisions of the first class have generally been sustained by the courts, with some difference of judicial opinion as to the latter class of cases; but the conflict of judicial decision, it will be found, usually precedes the written constitutions authorizing the referendum, and out of this conflict, it will be found, has grown the written constitution authorizing the referendum on matters affecting localities in the several States. The people have been driven to these constitutional restrictions to place a check upon legislative extravagance and the abuse of trust by the agents of government. It has been found necessary to protect the people through these instrumentalities, both from oppression and from uncertainty of judicial interpretation.

Other instances might be cited to show that affirmative legislation is contained in the fundamental laws of the States which have been enacted directly by the people. What difference can it make how the initial steps have been taken, whether pursuant to an enabling act which authorizes the people to formulate and directly vote upon a constitution, or whether without such enabling act, as has been done by Oregon and some other States of the Union on their own initiative, or by a certain percentage of the voters of a State, as authorized to be done under the Arizona constitution? Can it be said that in the latter case the constitution, which expressly authorizes it, makes the government of the State unrepublican, and in the former cases, where exactly the same results are obtained, the government of the States is republican? For Congress now to hold that the inclusion of the initiative and referendum in the fundamental law of Arizona would give to that State a form of government that was not republican in character, would of necessity revise the whole policy of the Government. Congress itself, by act of July 9, 1846, which had for its purpose the recession of a part of the District of Columbia to the State of Virginia, submitted to the qualified electors of the District the question of recession, provided the machinery for the election, and enacted that if a majority should be against accepting the provisions of the act it should be void and of no effect, otherwise it should be in full force.

The objection most seriously urged against the Arizona constitution is the provision which it contains with reference to the recall of public officers. There is no limitation as to the class of officers to whom it shall apply. It is general in its terms and is intended to reach those holding office, whether by election or appointment. The provision is not essentially different from that embodied in the constitutions of Oregon and Oklahoma, and possibly other States, as well as in the charters of many of the larger cities of the country.

The objection most frequently made to the Arizona constitution is the application of the recall to the judiciary. The question involved is not one of individual opinion but one of principle, and that is, whether the people of Arizona or the majority of them have the right, if they see fit, in their wisdom, to make the recall applicable to the judiciary as well as to other public servants. The argument usually urged against the application of the recall to the judiciary is that it tends to destroy its independence. To make this insistence impeaches the intelligence and integrity of the people of a State, and it assumes that for slight and trivial reasons, based upon the determination of an issue between individuals, or between an individual and the Commonwealth or between the Commonwealth and a nation, the machinery of the recall might be set in motion to punish a court with whom the majority of the people might disagree. That may be possible, but it is not at all probable; for, although the recall has been in operation for a number of years under charter and constitutional provisions like the Arizona constitution, it has only been used twice—once in the city of Los Angeles, Cal., and once in the city of Seattle, Wash. (I have just learned that it has been used in Texas on one occasion.) It is generally admitted by friends, as well as opponents of the measure, that there was justification for the recall in both instances, in one, at least, of which a servant and agent of the people, occupying the highest position in their gift, had entered into combination with gamblers and thugs and the denizens of the red-light district to levy graft and defeat the will of the people to purposes of piracy and plunder.

But as an abstract proposition, why should a judicial officer any more than any other public official be independent of the wishes of his constituents? It is not a democratic conception of republican government that places the representative in a position which will make him indifferent to the wishes of his constituents. Such a conception is aristocratic; it is monarchical; it is autocratic. The democratic conception, on the contrary, is that the people will think for themselves and that the agent or servant of the people, in whatever position he serves, is but the reflection of the popular will. As an abstract proposition, therefore, there is no reason why the judicial officer, as well as every officer of the Government, should not be responsive to the will of those whose servant he is. But the idea of the recall as applied to the judiciary, as well as to other agents, representatives, and servants of the people, is older than the Constitution itself. The principle has been recognized in every department of Government, and more particularly is this true with reference to the judiciary.

Section 33 of the bill of rights of Maryland, of 1776, provides:

That the independency and uprightness of judges are essential to the impartial administration of justice and a great security to the rights and liberties of the people; whereas the chancellor and judges ought to hold commissions during good behavior; and the said chancellor and judges shall be removed for misbehavior on conviction in a court of law, and may be removed by the governor upon the address of the general assembly: Provided, That two-thirds of all the members of each house concur in such address.

Absolutely leaving to the legislative body the power, upon the address of two-thirds of its membership, to remove the judge, even without a hearing; and there it was assumed that this was for the purpose of maintaining the independence of the judiciary rather than of affecting and destroying it.

This provision is reenacted in the constitution of 1851 (Art. IV, sec. 4) and in the constitution of 1864 (Art. IV, sec. 4) and again in the constitution of 1867 (Art. IV, sec. 4), and is at this time a part of the fundamental law of that State.

It has not had the effect to destroy the independency of the judiciary of that magnificent Commonwealth.

This observation may be made—and it is applicable to the constitutions of other States to which I shall call attention—that the recall of judges, in addition to the provision for removal on the ground of incompetency, of willful neglect of duty, of misbehavior in office, or any other crime, or on impeachment, is a general power and is left to the discretion of the general assembly. Sometimes a two-thirds vote is necessary and in other cases only a majority. The bill of rights of Maryland states the reasons for the vesting of this great discretionary power in the legislative assembly. It is because it was deemed necessary to maintain the independency and the uprightness of judges rather than to destroy their independency and responsibility for their acts.

The constitution of Georgia of 1798 (Art. III, sec. 1) provides that—

The judges of the superior court shall be elected for the term of three years, removable by the governor on the address of two-thirds of both houses for that purpose, or by impeachment and conviction thereon.

The same provision is to be found in the amendment to the constitution ratified in 1812, and again in the amendment ratified in 1818, and again in 1835 and in 1865.

No one has ever heard the integrity of the judicial system called in question in that State.

I call the attention of the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] to the constitution of Virginia, with which I know he is familiar.

The constitution of Virginia of 1830 (Art. V, sec. 6) contains the same provision. It was reenacted in the constitution of 1850 (Art. VII, sec. 17) and in 1864 (Art. VI, sec. 16) and in 1870 (Art. VI, sec. 23) and in 1902 (Art. VI, sec. 104). The power of removal for cause is vested in a majority of the members of the legislature. This provision is now a part of the fundamental law of Virginia.

The constitution of Texas of 1845 provides for the appointment of judges by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the senate, and Article IV, section 8, provides:

The judges of the supreme and district courts shall be removed by the governor, on the address of two-thirds of each house of the legislature, for willful neglect of duty or other reasonable cause—which shall not be sufficient ground for impeachment: Provided, however, That the cause or causes for which such removal shall be required shall be stated at length in such address and entered on the journals of each house: And provided further, That the cause or causes shall be notified to the judge so intended to be removed; and he shall be admitted to a hearing in his own defense before any vote for such address shall pass; and in all such cases the vote shall be taken by yeas and nays and entered on the journals of each house, respectively.

Absolutely vesting in the legislature the power of determining whether or not a cause exists—

It will be observed that the legislature is vested with the power, by a two-thirds vote, of compelling the governor to remove a judge for willful neglect of duty or other reasonable cause which shall not be sufficient ground for impeachment. This vests a most extraordinary power in a legislative body. Has its tendency been to compel the judiciary of that Commonwealth to decide controversies between citizens to suit the whims of the legislative assembly or to destroy the independence of the judiciary?

The same provision is to be found in the constitution of 1868 (Art. V, sec. 10) and in that of 1876 (Art. XV, sec. 8), and is now a part of the fundamental law of Texas.

The constitutions of Delaware, Connecticut, and other States have substantially the same provisions, but reference to a few only is sufficient to establish the principle for which I contend—that the power of recall with reference to the judiciary is not a new thing in the constitutional history of the country, and differs only in the Arizona constitution from the constitutions of other States in that there is a transference of the power of recall from the legislature to the people. The principle is the same. If the transference of this power to the people tends to destroy the independence of the judiciary may it not also be claimed that the power to exercise it in the case of the legislature tends to destroy that independence? Recent developments tend to show that some legislative bodies at least are influenced by the corruptest motives, and if they may be corrupted to secure the enactment or defeat of laws, or to secure the election or defeat of Senators, may they not be influenced by the same corrupt instrumentalities to unseat the judges? It is safe to say that the tenure of a judge, whether appointive or elective, is more secure in the hands of the people than in the average legislature of to-day.

But the recall has been applied from the earliest days of the Republic to other officers than judicial. In the summer of 1783—I call the attention of my Democratic friends to this—it was expected that the Assembly of Virginia would call a convention for the establishment of a constitution. Jefferson prepared a draft of one, with the design that it should be proposed in such convention. This draft, among other things, provided that—

The Delegates to Congress shall be appointed by joint ballot of both houses of the assembly for a term not exceeding one year, subject to being recalled within the term by joint vote of both said houses. (Jefferson's Notes on Virginia.)

It is probable that this suggestion of Jefferson had its birth in Article VIII of the bill of rights of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts of 1780, which provides:

In order to prevent those who are vested with authority from becoming oppressors, the people have a right, at such periods and in such manner as they shall establish by their frame of government, to cause their public officers to return to private life, and to fill up vacant places by certain and regular elections and appointments.

This declaration contained in the bill of rights of Massachusetts finds expression in Chapter IV of the constitution of 1780 of that Commonwealth, which provides for the election of Delegates to the Congress of the United States who "may be recalled at any time within the year and others chosen and commissioned" in their stead.

The constitution of New Hampshire of 1784 provides for the election of Delegates to the Congress, and states that they—may be recalled at any time within the year and others chosen and commissioned in the same manner in their stead.

The Articles of Confederation of 1778 (Art. V) contain, among other things, this provision:

ART. V. For the more convenient management of the general interest of the United States, Delegates shall be annually appointed, in such manner as the legislature of each State shall direct, to meet in Congress on the first Monday in November in every year, with a power reserved to each State to recall its Delegates, or any of them, at any time within the year, and to send others in their stead, for the remainder of the year.

So under the old Articles of Confederation that power was expressly reserved to each of the Colonies.

It may be argued that because this power was not reserved in the Federal Constitution that therefore the framers of that instrument thought it inadvisable to provide a method of recalling unfaithful or corrupt officials, but it must be remembered that the Constitution of the United States is but a grant of power and reserves to the people of the several States those powers which are not expressly granted; and in this view the Constitution of the United States is but a recognition of the power of the people of the several States to exercise those powers and privileges which had been exercised prior to the adoption of the Constitution. The exercise of the power by the people of Arizona is one of the rights reserved to the people, and the fact that they have seen fit to embody it in a written constitution should have no controlling influence with the Congress of the United States on the question of the admission of Arizona to the Union.

Having attempted to show that the initiative, the referendum, and the recall are as old or older than the Constitution of the United States, occasionally finding expression in the written constitutions of the Colonies and of the States, and again without this express recognition in such constitutions, being nevertheless exercised as a part of the power expressly reserved to the people of the several States, it is proper to consider why it is that one after another of the States of the Union has expressly ingrafted all of these powers as a part of the more modern written constitutions.

The movement has grown out of the perversion of the party system of government exercised through the caucus and convention. It has become necessary because this system, which was unknown to the framers of the Constitution, has through the instrumentality of the convention tended to destroy the integrity of the representative system of government. Just as the Australian-ballot law, the direct-primary law, and the corrupt-practices act have been resorted to for the protection of elections against the control and manipulation of corrupt influences, so the people have found it necessary to create a system of checks and balances in the fundamental laws of the States to protect them against the acts of the corrupt or faithless public servant, whether in the legislative or judicial or executive branches of the Government.

As long as these representatives nominated under the convention system were faithful to their duties there was no demand for the exercise of the reserve powers which are now expressly sought to be exercised through the instrumentality of the initiative, the referendum, and the recall. With the growth of the party system, however, and the development of the convention system, which removed the representative and public servant too far from the people and almost entirely out of touch with them, recourse to restrictive and controlling methods became necessary. It must be remembered in this connection that in colonial times and in the earlier days of the Government inaugurated under the Constitution parties as well as conventions were practically unknown. The people acted directly in matters of selecting their representatives and instructed them as to their duties. These instructions were implicitly obeyed. Gradually, with the growth of parties, systems were evolved for suggesting candidates and formulating policies and platforms as well. Candidates for the Presidency were nominated in the congressional caucus by the Representatives in Congress of the different political parties, but this method soon subjected itself to the charge of usurping the functions of the people, who considered themselves, rightly, the source of all power. It was eventually abandoned, and the convention system took its place.

The first convention was that held in 1831 by the anti-Masonic Party, and this was later followed by the Democratic and Whig Parties. The convention of delegates, although not recognized by the Constitution of the United States or the laws of Congress or of the States, continued to grow in strength and influence, using its power with such insolence that in 1844 John C. Calhoun refused to suffer his name to go before a convention for the presidential nomination, publishing an address in which he said amongst other things:

> I hold it impossible to form a scheme more perfectly calculated to annihilate the control of the people over the presidential election and vest it in those who make politics a trade and who live and expect to live on the Government. (Benton's Thirty Years' View, Vol. II, p. 596.)

At the Democratic national convention of 1844, although a majority of the delegates were pledged to Van Buren, who had formerly been President, he failed of nomination by reason of violated pledges, and Polk was nominated. In speaking of the convention Senator Benton says:

> That convention is an era in our political history to be looked back upon as the starting point in a course of usurpation which has taken the choice of President out of the hands of the people and vested it in the hands of a self-constituted and irresponsible assemblage. The wrong to Mr. Van Buren was personal and temporary, and died with the occasion, and constitutes no part of the object in writing this chapter; the wrong to the people and the injury to republican institutions and to our form of government was deep and abiding, and calls for the grave and correctional judgment of history. It was the first instance in which a body of men, unknown to the laws and the Constitution, and many of them (as being Members of Congress or holding offices of honor or profit) constitutionally disqualified to serve even as electors, assumed to treat the American Presidency as their private property, to be disposed at their own will and pleasure, and, it may be added, for their own profit, for many of them demanded and received reward. It was the first instance of such a disposal of the Presidency—for these nominations are the election, so far as the party is concerned—but not the last. It has become the rule since, and has been improved upon. These assemblages now perpetuate themselves through a committee of their own, ramified into each State, sitting permanently from four years to four years, and working incessantly to govern the election that is to come, after having governed the one that is past. The man they choose must always be a character of no force, that they may rule him; and they rule always for their own advantage, "constituting a power behind the throne greater than the throne."

Commenting upon Calhoun's views of the convention, Mr. Benton remarks:

> Mr. Calhoun considered the convention system, degenerated to the point it was in 1844, to have been a hundred times more objectionable than the Congress caucuses, which had been repudiated by the people. Measured by the same scale, they are a thousand times worse at present (1853), having succeeded to every objection that was made against the Congress caucuses and superadded a multitude of others going directly to scandalous corruption, open intrigue, direct bargain and sale, and flagrant disregard of the popular will. (Thirty Years' View, Vol. II, p. 597.)

Mr. President, it has taken the people of this country more than 60 years to realize the truth of the statement contained by Calhoun in his address and by Benton in his work, but they have gradually come to an understanding of the matter, and that has given birth to this progressive movement.

We have, therefore, eminent and respectable authority for the statement that the convention system in the first half century of our history had degenerated into a machine which not only disregarded the rights of the people, but usurped the powers and functions which it was intended by the framers of the Constitution should be and remain a part of the reserved rights of the people of the several States. This system, instead of growing better, has gradually grown worse since the days of Calhoun and Benton. Through it the party machine and the corrupt political boss have practically obtained control of the instrumentalities of government, both National and State.

Men who have watched the political movements of the times know that the chairmen of the various political parties in the different States of the Union, directly or indirectly, name the delegates to the county conventions, to the State conventions, and sometimes under the direction of the national chairman the delegates to the national convention. Through the power thus exercised candidates for the legislature are named in the county conventions and candidates for the State offices in the State conventions, so that in the final analysis, although the people have been deluded into the belief that because they have assisted in the election of men nominated for office in the manner I have suggested they have had a voice in their affairs; they have practically had no voice, because they have had little to do with the selection of their candidates. It is well known that men are frequently nominated for the legislatures and for State offices as well under this system not so much because of their fitness to represent or to serve their several constituencies as because it was well understood that they would act as the faithful representatives of the particular interests that it was intended they should serve. It has not been found so extremely difficult in times past, by the corrupt and copious use of money, to control conventions and to secure the nomination of men who could be relied upon to carry out the dictates of an unscrupulous party machine dominated by a more unscrupulous party boss. The money to accomplish these purposes has been furnished not infrequently by public-service and other great financial interests, by corporations, and by men who were interested not in accomplishing the greatest good for the greatest number, but in securing valuable franchises and special privileges without compensation, or in preventing the passage of laws that would stay their hands in raids upon the public treasury.

The interests of the people of a State have too often been subordinated to the packing of a convention in the interest of a particular candidate for the Senate of the United States, and all the money that has been necessary to do this has been furnished sometimes by corporations and interests entirely outside of the particular States. This money has not been furnished from motives of disinterested patriotism or philanthropy, but rather to insure the election of men who could be relied upon to stand as the representatives not of the people, but of special interests and the beneficiaries of class legislation.

We have recently had before us here in the Senate a case where the "jack pot" played an important part in the election of a Member of this Chamber, and it seems that the end of this celebrated case has not yet been reached. Instance after instance might be cited to show that particular interests, directing the movements of a corrupt political leader, have sought to control legislative bodies for their own corrupt purposes.

This condition is an absolute perversion of the purposes of government as established by our fathers. In theory the people have had a representative form of government; in fact it has not been representative. The history of the development of the party system of government, the evolution of the convention, the boss, the corrupt machine, and the spoils system is impartially and truthfully recited in Bryce's American Commonwealth, and not a statement therein contained but finds verification in the political conditions of to-day in State and Nation. We may, if we will, vilify the muckraker and abuse the independent press of the country, but these instrumentalities for the dissemination of news and turning the limelight on the rascals in public life have driven the people to understand at last that some corrective method must be applied to bring back the Government to the people, who are, and of right ought to be, the source of all power. The masses move slowly toward the correction of abuses and the adoption of reforms, but when once they know that their rights are being invaded they can be absolutely and entirely relied upon to work such reforms as may be necessary to correct the evils of government.

The magazines and the press, while they may have occasionally exaggerated conditions, have nevertheless told much of truth in reference to the rottenness of our system of government under the domination of the corrupt political boss and machine, and the movement for reforms may be traced to the light that has been turned on our affairs through their instrumentality. It is because of these conditions to which attention was called by Benton and Calhoun, and later by Bryce and the press and the magazine writers of the country, that the people have determined to secure to themselves purity, honesty, and efficiency in the administration of affairs. It was these conditions, which can not truthfully be denied, that gave life and vitality to the initiative and to the referendum as instrumentalities for securing to the people legislation which their representatives neglected to give them and to check extravagance and corruption on the part of these same representatives in the enactment of laws which were opposed to the public welfare and in the interests of the privileged classes. It was this condition which determined the people to assert their right to recall the faithless public servant, and the three in combination are a perfect safeguard to the rights of the people and an absolute check upon maladministration of affairs. They are essential to the perpetuation of our institutions and the preservation of a republican form of government.

Mr. OWEN. I ask, for the purpose of illustrating and emphasizing the argument made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], that there be printed as a Senate document an argument on the initiative and referendum before the supreme court of Oregon, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the following matter be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. SMOOT. Would the Senator object to having it go to the Committee on Printing?

Mr. OWEN. I have no objection to its going to the Committee on Printing, but I think there should be no objection to the printing. It is an argument in support of this proposition; it is directly in point; and I should like to have it printed as a document so as to have the Senate informed with regard to it.

Mr. SMOOT. I would very much prefer to have it go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. OWEN. Very well; I will make no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the matter will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I call up the motion I entered this morning to reconsider the action of the Senate in referring the joint resolution on the subject of the election of Senators by the people to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas moves to reconsider the action by which House joint resolution 39 was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator from Texas if he has any objection to letting the motion go over until the next meeting of the Senate.

Mr. CULBERSON. After a full consideration of the matter, I must insist upon action now on the motion.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I stated this morning, I was absent, necessarily, at the time this matter arose in the first instance before the Senate, and I desire to say now briefly what I should have said then had I been present.

This joint resolution in the same form was before the Judiciary Committee during the last session of Congress, and was passed upon favorably by the committee and brought to the Senate, and with some modification voted upon. Some three or four resolutions covering the same subject matter have been introduced during this extraordinary session and have already gone to the Judiciary Committee, and I naturally assumed that the resolution coming here from the House would follow the course of the other resolutions and go to the Judiciary Committee

I think that this joint resolution ought to be referred to the Judiciary Committee for a number of very good reasons. The first and most important reason is that to my mind the joint resolution has fared much better before the Judiciary Committee than it has fared before other committees. I desire to be entirely frank in regard to the matter. I am exceedingly anxious that the joint resolution should come before the Senate at as early a day as is practicable or possible, as are all friends of the resolution; and we feel that it should take the course which it has heretofore taken with some degree of success of its being heard.

Of course I am not to be construed as personally criticizing the members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but it is nevertheless a fact that that committee has had similar resolutions before it off and on for the last 20 years, and they have never reached the Senate so far as I have been able to determine as yet. I know the joint resolution will fare somewhat better if it is placed before the committee where it has already been passed upon favorably.

But there is a second reason which is a very good reason to my mind. There are questions involved in the joint resolution which are of considerable moment from a legal standpoint, and if the joint resolution should go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections it would very likely at some time during the session be referred to the Judiciary Committee for action, because there are questions involved in the resolution which the Judiciary Committee naturally have jurisdiction to consider, and it would undoubtedly be thought proper for that committee to take charge of the resolution. I do not know of anything that is of special importance in regard to the resolution that the Committee on Privileges and Elections would be peculiarly equipped to pass upon, but there are matters involved in the resolution upon which the Judiciary Committee, in the discharge of its proper functions and the exercise of its proper jurisdiction, ought to consider.

I hope, Mr. President, that this joint resolution will finally find its place before the committee where the other resolutions which have been introduced have gone, where this resolution in the same form at one time rested, and from which it came, the committee which really exercises a jurisdiction that ought to be exercised in this particular instance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas to reconsider the action of the Senate referring the joint resolution to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the title of the joint resolution be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The title will be read.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 39) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing that Senators shall be elected by the people of the several States.

Mr. GALLINGER. I object to a second reading of the joint resolution to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution goes over under the rule.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 2 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Thursday, April 20, 1911, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate April 17, 1911.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 17, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., as follows:

Our Father in Heaven, we thank Thee that the English-speaking people all over the world are pausing at this time from the busy whirl and turmoil of life's activities to celebrate the tricentennial of the King James version of the Bible, a light which shone out of the darkness, the basis of our civilization, food for the hungry, water for the thirsty, strength for the weak, rest for the weary, comfort for the sorrowing, and hope for the dying, a very present help in every trouble.

Grant, O most merciful Father, that it may bind us so closely together that war between us will be forever impossible; that we may march forward shoulder to shoulder in the peaceful pursuits of life to the higher civilization which waits on those who serve the Lord. And Thine be the praise forever, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, April 15, 1911, was read and approved.

THE PRAYER.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there are any words uttered within this Chamber that are more worthy of preservation or of more benefit to those who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD than those which fall from the lips of our Chaplain every morning. It will take but a stickful of space in the RECORD to print the invocation of our beloved blind Chaplain, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that hereafter during the Sixty-second Congress the morning prayer be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The Chair agrees with the gentleman and directs that the prayers be published in the RECORD.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBERS.

Mr. GALLAGHER and Mr. STACK, of Illinois, appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

SMOKING.

The SPEAKER. Several Members have requested the Chair to have read the last sentence of subdivision 7 of Rule XIV, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Neither shall any person be allowed to smoke upon the floor of the House at any time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair directs the officers of the House to see that that rule is enforced.

CANADIAN RECIPROCITY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 4412) to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of Canadian reciprocity, with Mr. SHERLEY in the chair.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am somewhat reluctant in attempting to make any remarks at this time on this measure. This bill is in the same form, with the exception of an added amendment, as it was when before the House only a few weeks ago, and at that time I expressed myself somewhat fully as to my opinion of the merits or demerits of the measure. The bill in its present form provides further than was provided for in the original bill introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], that the President of the United States shall have the power to further consider and, if possible, arrange further trade treaties with Canada with a view to placing other articles upon the free list than those mentioned in the proposed bill or treaty. It will be remembered that in the Dingley tariff law there was a provision, section 3, of that law, which gave the power to the President of the United States to make trade agreements with France and other nations when, in his judgment, he thought it might be wise to lower certain rates of duty on certain imports mentioned in that law. It will be well remembered by every gentleman present that the treaties were put upon our statute books. Such treaties were arranged between Germany, France, and other nations of the world by the President, the provisions of which were disastrous to the people of the United States. All of those treaties were repealed when the present Payne tariff law was enacted. All those treaties were abrogated; that is to say, the President of the United States was directed to give notice to all those nations which had entered into treaties with the United States that at a certain time those treaties should be discontinued.

I want to call the attention of some gentlemen present, because it applies to this bill, that in these trade treaties it was provided that goods coming into this country should pay a rate of duty based upon the foreign value of such goods when imported, and great frauds under those treaties were perpetrated upon our Government by undervaluation, and it is, perhaps, a matter of common knowledge to all gentlemen present that under existing laws that practice has been carried on, and only recently some great sugar-refining companies of this country were convicted by the Government for frauds upon the United States Treasury, and some New York firm was prosecuted (and I am not certain but that case is now in court) for undervaluations on valuable works of art. The matter was called to the attention of the Committee on Ways and Means when they were preparing the tariff law that on one article alone, a certain kind of china cups and saucers, it had been found by the manufacturers of that class of goods in this country that there had been a very large importation of that kind of chinaware from Europe, which was being sold at a lower price than that class of goods could be made for by Americans, and upon investigation a gentleman before our committee stated that he had been sent abroad by the china manufacturers of this country and, after long effort, located the manufacturers of these goods in Belgium. It was found that the manufacturers of these goods in Belgium had a house in Paris, France, which was really a branch house, or a part of the institution, although under another name. It was found that the concern in Paris was shipping those goods to some one in America, really a member of the firm that manufactured the goods, and at the time the investigation was made it was found that the actual cost value of the importation of cups and saucers alone, as I now remember, was eight and a half million dollars, yet the import value, as given by the importer, was $5,000,000; and, therefore, this Government had been robbed of its fair rate of duty on three and a half million dollars' worth of goods out of a total value of eight and a half million dollars.

Therefore, gentlemen, I wish to warn you against voting for further continuance of such practice, against placing in the hands of any one individual in this country the power to make our trade treaties. But I must add that in this bill that section provides, however, that before those treaties can become effective they must be approved by Congress. That is a saving clause. But, gentlemen, when you deal with treaties of that kind it is like a child playing with fire. I want to caution you against it. I would vote against the Canadian trade agreement because of that provision alone, even if I had no other objection to the treaty.

I want to say in the beginning that I am an admirer of our President, William H. Taft. He will be the Republican candidate for reelection, if he lives until that time. [Applause on the Republican side.] If I am alive at that time, I will give him my most hearty support, as I have in the past. I am frank to say, gentlemen, that I disagree with his views on Canadian reciprocity. I have a right to disagree with him on that proposition, or with any other, or all men. I am exercising my judgment as my conscience dictates as to what is right and best for the American people; and upon that platform I am going to stand.

There is no question in the mind of any man within the sound of my voice, or beyond the sound of my voice, but that conditions in Canada to-day are as good, if not better, than ever before in the history of that country. Before I conclude my remarks I will try to give you some of what, in my judgment, I consider good reasons why the people of Canada are prosperous to-day. I may say in the beginning, however, that they are a protective nation. They believe in protection, not only for Canadian labor but Canadian capital as well. And they are carrying that out to a greater extent than the people of the United States are to-day carrying out that policy so long cherished by the Republican Party in this country. In order to preserve to Canadian labor the right to produce the things in that country that under their protective-tariff system they claim would be most beneficial to their laboring people and to their capital, let me say to you that they are protecting to the extreme all their raw materials.

In the enactment of the Dingley law of 1897 a clause was inserted providing that an additional duty on lumber should be added to any country that put an export duty on logs, the raw forest material. Canada was quick to find a way to get around that feature of our law, because at that time we were importing into this country from Canada large quantities of saw logs and the sawmills around the Great Lakes were manufacturing annually 400,000,000 feet of lumber cut from Canadian saw logs imported from Canada. Canada quickly saw the wisdom, as I have said, in the policy of retaining for Canadian capital and Canadian labor the manufacturing of that 400,000,000 feet of lumber in Canada. And what did they do? Instead of placing an export duty upon logs, they put an embargo upon them. They put a provision in their license, a license to cut timber from public lands, and all lands, practically, in Canada are owned by the Provinces, which license expires the 1st of May every year, that provided that the holder of the license when cutting timber from those lands should manufacture that product in Canada, preserving thereby to the labor of Canada the right to put from five to eight dollars of labor upon every thousand feet of lumber taken from their woods—a very wise provision, indeed. And from that day to this, my friends, practically no logs have been imported into the United States from Canada, except in the great Northwest, on Puget Sound, under a law which permits the officer in charge to remove that embargo at will by giving 30 days' notice in certain papers. From time to time, when their log market in the Northwest has become congested by an oversupply of logs, that embargo has been removed and they have dumped their surplus of logs at times upon our markets and then immediately put back the embargo. But no American, no owner of a sawmill in the United States, under any law, is warranted in beginning a logging operation in Canada with the view of bringing his logs to a sawmill in the United States. It is prohibited in every Province in Canada. But I say in that respect, my friends, Canada has been exceedingly wise in protecting her home industry and home labor.

Some gentleman on the floor of the House made some remarks about barbed fencing wire. That article is mentioned in this trade treaty. Upon an examination of the records I find that no barbed wire has come into this country from Canada at all.

You are not honest with the farmers of this country when you say to them, "We are going to give you free barbed wire from Canada."

Now, my friends, the farmer is no young bird to be fooled on chaff. You can not flimflam the farmer by any such provision in this or any other law.

I find, on the other hand, that we shipped into Canada last year seven hundred and some odd thousand dollars' worth of barbed-wire fencing. The factories of this country produced that much of wire fencing and shipped it into Canada. I am delighted indeed to know that an institution in this country can send its product to Canada and sell it at a profit.

It is proposed in the farmers' free-trade bill, introduced by our Democratic friends, to put barbed wire for fencing from the whole world on the free list and bring it into this country. Look up the records and find out how much has been brought in under existing law. Practically none. But it is true, in order to protect that industry in this country, in existing law there is a duty of three-quarters of a cent per pound on that class of wire.

I am one of the committee who voted for that law. I am ready at all times to preserve not only the American market for American manufactures, but I am ready at all times to protect every institution, every mill, every factory, every forge in this land, whether it be in the Southland or in the Northland, against the cheap labor of the world. I want to see all the barbed wire or any other wire fencing that is consumed in this country produced from the iron mines of the United States and converted into finished product by American capital and American labor. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But let me go further and say that there is no change in the existing law on wire in this trade agreement. Our wire went into Canada free of duty before this treaty was ever thought of. Why, then, is it put into the law at all? Perhaps upon the assumption that hereafter Canada is going to produce barbed wire cheaper than we can produce it. Then some day in the far-off future our farmers can buy from Canada barbed wire cheaper than they can buy it from the manufacturers in this country.

You are focusing your range at a very long distance when you throw out a sop of that kind to the American farmer.

Now, there is a document known as Senate document No. 862, introduced in the Senate by ex-Senator Carter, of Montana, a gentleman for whom I have the highest admiration. He is an estimable gentleman, an intelligent man. I regret exceedingly on seeing him go out of the Congress of the United States. He was one of the great legislators of this country. But upon an examination of that document which I have here—and I am sincere in that statement—it would appear that instead of Senator Carter having prepared that document, he never read it; never read its contents. It says, "Mr. Carter presented the following." That is the only place in the document that you can find the slightest semblance of Mr. Carter's name, or his intellect or his politics in it. It was undoubtedly prepared by somebody who is a gatherer of statistics.

In that article, which I have not the time to analyze fully, you will find that the writer says by opening up our markets to Canada's wheat and removing our duty of 25 cents per bushel, the flour mills of the United States can control the market of flour for the world; that by giving the flouring mills of this country free trade in wheat from Canada they can monopolize the flour market of Europe; that we have the milling capacity at the present time to supply all Europe with flour.

The average man to-day is preaching against monopoly, but here is a man who would monopolize the flour market of the world by our giving free trade in wheat. I know some stories that would work in well here, but I am too busy trying to quote to you actual facts to inject any nonsense into my remarks. The gentleman argues that if the duties on wheat are removed, the mills in the United States can purchase Canada's wheat and then supply England and all Europe with flour.

How weak and flimsy is such an argument! The writer evidently does not know the terms of existing law. I presume every man here knows the existing law on wheat as well as I do, but fearing someone might not know the terms of existing law will say there is no bar to-day against mills in the United States supplying Europe with flour under practically free trade conditions. There are two provisions in our tariff law. One provides that the manufacturers of flour in this country can import wheat from any foreign country, and when exporting the finished product of that wheat can go to the Treasury of the United States and draw back 99 per cent of the duty paid.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. FORDNEY. Certainly.

Mr. STANLEY. Where the Canadian wheat and the American wheat are mixed, as I understand they are in these large mills, is it practicable then to get this drawback?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. I thank the gentleman for the question. It is as practicable to get that drawback on the imported wheat in that barrel of flour as it is to get the drawback on the imported lumber in a door made partly out of Canadian lumber and partly out of American lumber, because all that is necessary is for the miller to furnish satisfactory affidavits to the Treasury of the United States as to the amount of foreign imported wheat that a barrel of flour contains, and that is very easy. Now, let me go just a little further on that, and say to you that I was engaged in the manufacture of flour at one time just long enough to lose all the money I put into the industry, but to get some education in the business. I was interested for five years in the manufacture of flour. I found that by economical methods and modern machinery and the proper kind of bolting cloths a barrel of flour, 196 pounds, can be produced from 4 bushels and 40 pounds of wheat. There are 280 pounds of wheat in 4 bushels and 40 pounds. That leaves 84 pounds of offal, bran, and middlings, or shorts, as some people call it. In the manufacture of foreign imported wheat that is exported, on which the miller is entitled to a drawback, he must either export the offal or pay duty on it. But I contend, gentlemen, that when he sends abroad only the flour and markets the bran and middlings in this country, which come in competition with the same article manufactured from American grain, he ought to pay duty on that which he markets in the United States. On 4 bushels and 40 pounds of wheat the duty at 25 cents a bushel is $1.16⅔, or nearly that fraction. With a drawback of 99 per cent of that it leaves the duty cost to the American manufacturer 1⅛ cents per barrel. Is that going to prevent any miller in this country from importing wheat from Canada and then exporting the manufactured product? If so, I would like to have some man figure it out to me.

Again, there is another provision in our law that permits the American miller to import wheat in bond and take it to his mill sealed in the car. The Government will either break the seal or authorize the miller to break it and take that wheat into his mill and convert it into the finished product, put it back into the car, and send it abroad, without the payment of any duty at all. If the statements I have made are true, can you tell me any bar to the American miller right now bringing in all the Canadian wheat his mill can grind, converting it into the finished product, and then sending it abroad?

But, my friends, when our present tariff law was being prepared by the committee, mill men appeared before that committee and demanded free trade on Canadian wheat, because they said they are so handicapped by red tape in getting back this 99 per cent of duty. Ah, my friends, the "nigger in the fence" is that they want the offal put upon the free list, because they want to market it in the United States. Now, on the other hand, I have told you what the existing law is. Do you believe it is possible to take down our tariff wall, invite competition from the whole world on competitive products, and under that system raise the price of our products in this country? I never knew but one man who claimed to be a great man who used such an argument. As to his being a great man, he and I differ. He is an ex-Senator from Indiana. He said he was in favor of a law that would increase the wages of American laboring men and also decrease the price of the product of such labor. He reminds me of a man who once said he could do anything on God's green earth that any other man could do. Some one who doubted him said, "There was a gentleman here yesterday who lifted himself by the ears of his boots. Let us see you do it." He spent the balance of the summer in trying and finally failed.

Mr. Carter introduced this bill. He is a great man, but evidently introduced it without due consideration.

He reminds me of a piece of attempted legislation introduced by a member of the legislature of one of our States. He, too, evidently introduced a bill which had been sent to him by a friend and without his reading it at all. When read, it was found that it provided for the improvement by deepening and widening the alimentary canal. [Laughter.] There is just about as much sense in this proposition as there was in that.

That wheat is cheaper in Canada than it is in the United States no intelligent man will dispute. Some argument has been made here that the price of wheat on both sides of the line does not vary much, if any. But the gentleman making that argument forgets that the grade of wheat mentioned or the price of wheat in the various markets is based upon the value and the grade of the wheat. All grades of wheat are not of the same value. So when the price of wheat is stated to be the same in Canada as in the Dakotas and Minnesota or at Minneapolis and St. Paul markets, you may mark down in your memorandum books that it is not the same grade of wheat, because there is a difference in the value in our markets for the various grades of wheat.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. Is it the gentleman's contention that the higher price of wheat in the United States, conceding that it is higher, is due to the protective tariff on wheat?

Mr. FORDNEY. It is, and I will try to give the gentleman my reason. I thank the gentleman from Tennessee, with all courtesy. I will answer all questions asked me to the best of my ability.

Mr. SIMS. I know the gentleman will, and that is the reason I asked the question.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will give you some figures that will explain that which I have taken from the records. During the four years prior to the last Democratic, and the only Democratic, administration we have had since the Republican Party was born, the years 1890, 1891, 1892, and 1893, we produced in this country per year 480,000,000 bushels, in round numbers. The price of that wheat for those four years averaged the farmers of the country 71 cents per bushel, or $1,383,000,000. For the four years during the life of the Wilson bill, or its anticipation rather, it was only on the statute books 36 months, as I remember—for the four years during the agitation of that question and the life of the law, we produced in this country 471,000,000 bushels of wheat per year. The value of the wheat in this country at that time was 63.4 cents per bushel. The value of the wheat in this country, based upon the price for those four years compared with the previous four years, brought a loss to our farmers of $180,000,000.

I have gone further, my friends, and have followed the statistics for four years following the repeal of the Wilson bill—and, by the way, the Wilson bill did not admit wheat free of duty; the rate of duty in that law was 20 per cent ad valorem—and during the life of that bill was the time I had my experience in the milling business. I purchased wheat in the State of Michigan at my mill for 48 cents a bushel delivered at the mill. During the four years succeeding the life of that bill, which placed wheat upon the protected list at 20 per cent ad valorem, the production of wheat in this country amounted to 625,000,000 bushels per year and the price 69.9 cents, a difference to the farmer, as compared with the four years of Democratic tariff laws, of $200,180,000.

Now, my friends, let us go further. It is contended by the friends of this treaty that by placing wheat on the free list our exports will increase. How much truth or fact is there in that argument? I believe a fair comparison with our exports during the life of the Wilson bill would be a good test. Let me state what our exports were under that bill and for four years prior and the succeeding four years.

Our total exports for the four years prior to the adoption of that bill were 417,000,000 bushels. And during these four long, lean, lank years, when the duty had been lowered on wheat to 20 per cent ad valorem, we exported only 364,000,000 bushels.

Now, for the next four years, with an increased rate of duty to 25 cents a bushel, there were 582,000,000 bushels exported. Is there anything in that argument that will lead any man of fair mind to contend that by lowering the duty on wheat we are going to increase our exports? If so, furnish me with the proof. While I am not from Missouri, I am a protectionist.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. If increasing the tariff increases the exports, how does it increase the price of wheat in this country?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, by protecting American institutions and American capital the wheels of industry in this country run full time. The people are encouraged under prosperity [applause on the Republican side] and they languish under free trade. We produced less wheat in the country then than we did before or since. Because of the price the farmer was depressed and he resorted to the production of some other article upon his farm from which he made some profit, and I contend that under a protective system when our institutions are running full blast we can produce at a lower cost than when running on half-time, as I will try to show in another line of industry which I can, perhaps, make a little clearer than I can the question of wheat. But all know that the farmer of this country at that time was in poverty—not in good standing, but in poverty—during those four years; and again during those four lean years the statistics show that we consumed in this country but 3½ bushels of wheat per capita per annum, where, under existing law—and this condition has existed now for 12 years—the American people are consuming to-day nearly 6½ bushels per capita per annum. A great orator once said upon the floor of this House in arguing for a protective tariff—

> Give work to the laboring man and you furnish him employment for his teeth.

We consume more to-day than we did then, and that is reasonable, because our purchasing power is greater to-day than it was then. It is perfectly reasonable when a man's wages are $2 per day, as compared with $1 per day, that his purchasing power is just double, but his purchasing power is measured to a large extent by the prices paid for the articles that he consumes. Lower prices prevail to-day for all farm products in this country than have prevailed now for several years.

All will admit that for the last few years prices of farm products have been abnormal, but during all that time manufactured products have gone on only at a reasonable price in this country. Labor has been advanced further than has the price of the manufactured product, but not quite in line with the advance in the prices of agricultural products; but with declining prices in all agricultural products to-day, we do not hear of any reduction of wages in any institution in the country, or at least but very few.

My friend Mr. McCALL, a gentleman for whom I have the very highest regard, in an article in the Independent, published as of April 6, said that the way to increase or aid our markets is to aid the customer; that if you increase the purchasing power of the customer you will increase the markets for your own products. I agree with the gentleman fully in every respect in that statement, but when the gentleman from Massachusetts made that statement he was talking about Canada, about increasing the purchasing power of the Canadian, and therefore, he said, giving to our farmers in this country a better market for their products. The gentleman evidently overlooked the fact that when he was talking about increasing the purchasing power of seven and a half or eight million people in Canada, he was striking a deathblow at 35,000,000 farmers in the United States. The gentleman is overlooking the important fact that when you are aiding the Canadian in his purchasing power by opening up our markets to him for his products, the farmers of the United States are the greatest purchasers of all products, both manufactured and agricultural, on the face of the globe.

The gentleman from Massachusetts would cast aside the 35,000,000 men, women, and children on farms in this country and look solely to the interest of the Canadian in order that we might sell a little more barbed wire over there. Again, the gentleman from Massachusetts states in that article that on wheat and flour we are sending to Canada more than we purchase from Canada. The gentleman is absolutely wrong in his figures. It is true that a great deal of exports of wheat and flour from this country enter Canada and leave Canada on their way to Europe, and I think the gentleman obtains his figures from such exportations, giving credit for all of that to Canada. But let me call his attention to the figures set forth in this trade treaty, in which he will find that last year we exported to Canada in round numbers less than 55,000 bushels of wheat. We imported from Canada during that same time nearly 153,000 bushels of wheat. At the same time we exported to Canada, in round numbers, 31,000 barrels of flour and imported from Canada 144,000 barrels of flour. Where does the gentleman from Massachusetts get his figures? When I was in the flour-mill business, like Mr. CARTER with his argument that he introduced, I went into the business because I had more money than brains, and very little of either, perhaps. I purchased a mill in my home town, and after getting into the business I found that we had in that city a milling capacity for 700 barrels of flour a day in a town with but 45,000 people, and the consuming capacity of the people of that town was less than 200 barrels per day, so that in order to run our mill for 10 hours a day we were obliged to export from the city 500 barrels of flour per day, and we had to go out into the world to find a market for that much surplus flour manufactured in my home town.

The question of exporting flour came up, and I examined the rates of freight abroad. We were at that time exporting a fair share of our product to Providence, R. I., on which we paid 73 cents per barrel freight from Saginaw, Mich., to Providence, R. I. I found that the great flour mills of Duluth, Minn., and Minneapolis and St. Paul were at the same time sending flour to London, England, for 50 cents a barrel, and as soon as my supply of money ran out I went out of the flour business; and I would advise all of my friends to keep out of the business unless you have very cheap fuel, such as water power, for you can not succeed beyond the limits of the county in which your flour mill is located unless you have very cheap power or cheap fuel.

Mr. SIMS. Would it annoy the gentleman if I interrupted him?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; the gentleman would not annoy me.

Mr. SIMS. Is it a fact, then, that we do lose on the wheat and flour we ship abroad?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, no; I do not say that; I do not think so.

Mr. SIMS. If flour is higher and wheat is higher here than abroad, how can we sell abroad at a profit?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will tell you this much, my friend. It is an old argument, but I believe it is a correct one on the question of selling our stuff abroad cheaper than we sell at home. For illustration, my friend, I am in the lumber business, and during the period of low prices which prevailed in 1907 we found we could not run our mill for 10 hours a day without piling up a very large amount of lumber on hand, with a large amount of capital invested, at a great risk of fire, and with no market for your lumber.

In addition to that you will understand that in that business a man insuring his lumber is a coinsurer to the extent of 20 per cent of the value of the lumber, so you can not get the full rate of insurance in this country on the value of your lumber and it is a great risk to pile up unlimited quantities. The important thing is where does your money come from. We found that we could perhaps market what lumber we could produce in an 8 hours' run instead of 10 hours. We reduced our hours from 10 to 8 per day and for 3 months we proceeded to try out that plan. We could not dispose of a superintendent, we could not dispose of a bookkeeper, we could not lessen our taxes, we could not lessen our insurance, we could not lessen the depreciation of our property. In other words the overhead or dead expense goes on just the same whether you run 8 hours or 10 hours or 12 hours per day, and we found after running for 3 months under the best management we could have that it cost $1 per thousand feet more to manufacture our lumber running 8 hours than it did to run 10 hours and we were obliged to abandon that plan. Therefore I say, my friends, if you are engaged in an industry, be it farming or any other industry, by running to the fullest capacity is when you produce at the lowest possible cost and by running your institution, be it a farm or factory, and selling at a reasonable profit to the home consumption you can afford to export your surplus at cost, and still employ American labor and make more money than one could by closing down.

Therefore, when we learn of goods being exported at a lower price than they are sold at home for, it is my candid opinion it is under such conditions, because when you are piling up a surplus and your warehouse is filled to the roof there is but one of two things to do—you must either unload that surplus or you must close the institution. And I ask you, in all spirit of fairness, whether under such circumstances it would be best for the proprietor to send abroad that surplus, emptying his warehouse and continue running, employing American labor and American capital, or to close down until the surplus is worked off? My business schooling, which has not been a short one, has taught me to believe that it is best to keep the wheels of the industries of this country running and employ American labor, because that labor is the best purchaser for our goods in the world. It furnishes us the greatest market for all our manufactured and agricultural products. As an illustration—and I am not making a political speech, but I believe the argument fits in on this treaty—we sold abroad last year $1,800,000,000 worth of American farm and manufactured products. The whole world consumed less than $14,000,000,000 worth of imported products, while here at home, Americans, citizens of the United States, consumed nearly $30,000,000,000 worth, or more than twice the total imports of the whole world outside of the United States. By opening up our tariff gates and letting into this country the cheaper products of all foreign countries, are you going to curtail that production at home and supply the citizens of the United States with articles made abroad rather than made at home? If so, you and I differ in our opinions, because I contend that any article, no matter what it may be, consumed in this country, that is imported from abroad—that is, a competitive article—is exceedingly high priced to the American people, because it displaces just that much capital and just that much labor at home.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. LANGLEY. Is the gentleman going to discuss the lumber question before he takes his seat?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. LANGLEY. I want to ask you one or two questions in regard to it.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will be glad to answer you.

Mr. KENDALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KENDALL. Has the gentleman concluded as to one of his propositions there?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. KENDALL. Of course the gentleman understands, as all Republicans do, that our last platform declared for a tariff measuring the difference in productive cost in America and abroad. I want to inquire of the gentleman, who is a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, whether in the preparation of the pending measure any report of the Tariff Commission, which has been created to ascertain those facts, was in possession of the committee?

Mr. FORDNEY. I thank the gentleman for the question. There was absolutely none at all. If so, it was in the hands of the majority. That is the first time I have had the pleasure of using that term on the floor for 12 years. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KENDALL. I want to inquire further of the gentleman if the Committee on Ways and Means undertook to revise the tariff on all the agricultural products of the country without availing itself of the information as to productive cost at home and abroad, which we supposed would be furnished by this Tariff Commission?

Mr. FORDNEY. Does the gentleman now refer to the proposed free-trade bill?

Mr. KENDALL. I refer to this bill and the companion measure, popularly designated as the "farmers' free-trade bill."

Mr. FORDNEY. So far as I am informed, not one word of information came from the Tariff Board or anywhere else to the Committee on Ways and Means in the preparation of this or the other or any other bills.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Michigan has always been opposed to constituting a Tariff Board, I believe, has he not?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, no. The gentleman misunderstands me. I have always been opposed to the creation of a tariff commission, because I could see a difference between a tariff commission and a tariff board, and while I have not been very enthusiastic for a tariff board, I have contended that if there is any information that Representatives of this great people could have that they do not have in the preparation of those great laws, we should have it, no matter what channel it came through. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Would the gentleman like to have more time?

Mr. FORDNEY. I would like to. Do not limit me. I will try to get through as quickly as I can.

Mr. DALZELL. Then, Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman without limit for the present.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Now, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. It so happens that the subject of the cost of production of farm products in Canada and the United States is one of the subjects on which this so-called Tariff Board has made a report, as is evidenced in Senate Document No. 849, printed on March 1, 1911; and if the gentleman desired to obtain any information on that subject he could have consulted that report.

Mr. FORDNEY. I thank the gentleman. I did not know that there was such a report. If so, it was not brought to the attention of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. KENDALL. Is it possible that the Committee on Ways and Means in preparing this important bill has utterly ignored that official report?

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me say to the gentleman that I asked the question when the committee was reporting this bill, and some other gentleman asked the question, if some one were not going to call upon the Tariff Board for information on this subject, and it was said by some one of the gentlemen of the majority that they would have no hearings unless someone should have additional information to present; that they thought they had a sufficient amount of evidence and information on file during the hearings that was presented to the Ways and Means Committee when the committee were preparing the Payne tariff law.

Mr. BUCHANAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will in a moment. I then said to the gentleman that I understood that the Democratic Party were very anxious to have a tariff commission appointed in order that they might have better and more information on the subject of our tariff laws than had been obtained under present conditions.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would like to ask the gentleman why it is that the representatives of the steel interests and the lumber interests claim they are interested in the American workingmen when tens of thousands of foreign workingmen are working in the mills, while tens of thousands of American workingmen are walking the highways seeking employment?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will say to my friend that I know of no law that discriminates against any man seeking employment and getting a fair day's wages for a fair day's work.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman, then, is not informed.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, there are a lot of things that the gentleman from Michigan does not know. I admit that. [Laughter.] The things that I do not know would make a great deal larger book than the things that I do know. But then there are a few things that I do claim to know, and those are the things that I am trying to express myself on here. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CONNELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FORDNEY. Wait just one minute, if you please, sir. I will say now to the gentleman [Mr. BUCHANAN], who has mentioned the steel company, that I infer he has reference to the United States Steel Corporation. Let me say to my friend that I had occasion to ascertain not long ago the number of men employed by that one concern—the great United States Steel Co. I had occasion to make inquiry, and learned the amount of money paid out by that one company to their labor last year, and I will give to you the astounding figures. I find that while it was stated by the president of that company—Mr. Gary, president of the United States Steel Co.—that they could produce steel cheaper than any other company in this country, because nearly all other manufacturers of steel purchase more or less pig iron from them, on which the United States Steel Co. make a profit, yet they did not want to crush out competition; they could run their institution without any protection at all, but in doing so their smaller competitors would be obliged to go out of business and they themselves would be compelled to reduce the wages paid to their labor. I found that last year that company had in their employ, in round numbers, 225,000 men, and their pay roll reached nearly $175,000,000, or an average of about $2.70 per man per day. I do not want to see any law upon our statute books that will lower the price paid for labor in this country, whether that law is intended to protect a corporation, a copartnership, a farmer, or a laboring man, because when you lower the price paid to labor, as I have said, you are curtailing the purchasing power of your best customer in the land. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Can the gentleman give us the amount of dividends declared by that United States Steel Corporation for that same year?

Mr. FORDNEY. I never owned a share of stock in the United States Steel Corporation, or in any other steel company, in my life. I know nothing about it, and I care less. I want to be courteous to the gentleman, but I do not know anything about it. I presume they pay good profits. If they do not, they are the biggest fools on earth. You and I would not be long in their shoes until we would try to make a reasonable profit upon our investment. If not, we would soon go out of business.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Would we kick if the profits were more than reasonable?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know. I have never seen profits too high to suit me.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is not that also true of the Steel Trust?

Mr. FORDNEY. I want to ask the gentleman, or any other man within the sound of my voice, was there ever a time in your life, or do you ever expect to see the time, when your profits will be so high that you object?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. That being true, ought the law to give to me or any other person a right to gratify cupidity, and collect more than a fair profit through the instrumentality of a law that was created to enable that to be done?

Mr. FORDNEY. My good friend, if you believe that the United States Steel Corporation, or any other corporation in this land, is exacting from the people a greater profit than it is entitled to, we have antitrust laws upon our statute books to stop it immediately by proper proceedings, by the proper authority, and not through a revision of our tariff laws, in my opinion.

Mr. CONNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield to the gentleman; but I will ask the gentleman to make his question brief, as I am consuming too much time.

Mr. CONNELL. I understood the gentleman to say that he went into the flour business at the time of the Wilson law, lost all his money, and made a failure of it. I want to ask him if he would have succeeded in that business except for the Wilson law, and if that was the reason why failure came to him in his experiment in the flour business.

Mr. FORDNEY. My friend, I have learned long ago never to cry over spilt milk. I am not crying because I lost my money. The experience was well worth it, and I have been a died-in-the-wool protectionist ever since. [Applause on the Republican side.] I am going to stick to it. I believe, sir, our tariff laws at that time had much to do with low prices, because as a result of that law our industries were depressed in this country at that time. We were in poverty, sir.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; if the gentleman will pardon me, let me go on just a little while.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] frequently referred to me in his speech on Saturday. I did not interrupt him, because I seldom interrupt anyone who is making a speech on the floor of this House. I knew I would have an opportunity to answer him. I never saw or heard such a physical effort from any man in my life as he made on Saturday. I will say to him that if the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] will go in the Northern States and repeat that speech word for word, so that all the people north of the Mason and Dixon line may hear him in that great exhibition, I will guarantee him that there will not be a Democratic Member of Congress returned to this House from that part of the country in the next two years. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman said that with lower prices we are more prosperous. He is in favor of free trade. I never heard of anything that had the word "free" attached to it that I did not believe the gentleman from North Carolina would be in favor of. But let me call his attention to this fact: We had a Democratic administration in 1894, 1895, and 1896 and up to March 4, 1897. What were the prevailing conditions at that time? We had lower prices then. We had lower prices on everything produced and consumed in this country. Were we in a more prosperous condition then than we are to-day? Let me call the gentleman's attention to this fact. He tried to taunt the Republicans for failing to pass certain legislation, and said that a Republican President had called the Democrats together to undo that which a Republican Congress had done. I ask the gentleman from North Carolina, who called Congress together in 1897 to undo what the Democratic Party had done the only time they had an opportunity to enact our laws for over 50 years?

Let me tell you what you did. You bankrupted the Nation, or nearly so. Horses never were so cheap in this country as they were in 1894, 1895, and 1896, and yet every poor devil in the land had to go on foot. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. In just a minute. Beefsteak never was so cheap since Adam came on earth. I happened to be an alderman in the town in which I lived, and during those lean years laboring men came to me in numbers and asked me to vote for a higher rate of wages for street laborers in our city because they said they could not afford meat but twice a week. Gentlemen, you never knew a time in your life, and I hope you never will know a time, when liver was in such great demand. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me finish this paragraph first. I am dealing with an answer to the gentleman from North Carolina. Clothing never was so cheap since the Republic was created, and our laboring men and their wives and their children went in tatters and rags, and you know it. We never were in need of clothing so much in our lives as we were during the four years when everything was so cheap. Can you deny it? If so, furnish your proof. Every laboring man in the land went about the country, and there were 3,000,000 unemployed laboring men, every one wearing a Democratic badge, a patch 8 by 10 inches on the seat of his pants. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

You never knew a time when there were as many farm mortgages spread on our records in this country as there were during the life of that bill. What caused it? Low prices and poverty to the farmer. The farmer is just exactly like a great nation. When his bank account runs low and he does not produce the farm articles that he can convert into money for his necessary running expenses, he must (just like this Nation did when your party was in power) put a mortgage on his farm.

But there is a day of reckoning when the mortgage must be paid. We are paying the interest, my friends, on the mortgage that your party put upon the Federal farm during your last administration. You will remember that you issued through your Executive $262,400,000 worth of Government bonds and sold them in Europe to get gold to put into the Treasury of the United States to pay the running expenses of this Government, upon which there was a premium of $30,000,000, or thereabouts, received, a total of $290,000,000 or more.

That money was put in the Treasury not for any improvements in the land, because the President had vetoed a river and harbor bill carrying an appropriation of $80,000,000, and when the people called Congress together to undo what your party had done, that money was gone and but a little of it left in the Treasury of the United States.

We undid the things that you had done during your administration. We brought prosperity back to the country again, and the wheels of industry have rolled all over the land from that day to this, and if you will let us alone they will continue to roll. During these four years, in addition to the farm mortgages that I have referred to, there was railroad property in this country in the hands of receivers to the tune of $1,800,000,000. The like has never been found in the history of the world before or since, when all industries languished as they did then.

Mr. HOBSON. Does the gentleman care to yield for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. With pleasure.

Mr. HOBSON. It is merely in connection with the gentleman's reference to the issue of bonds by the Democratic administration. I merely wish to ask the gentleman if that was not the result of the Sherman silver-purchase bill, a Republican measure, and if relief did not finally come with the repeal of that bill by a Democratic Congress?

Mr. FORDNEY. Perhaps the gentleman is right. Whether he is or not I do not know, but I do know this, Mr. Chairman, that the Democratic Party issued the bonds to get the money, and it was all expended before our party again come into control.

Mr. POU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Certainly.

Mr. POU. Is the gentleman talking about those same bonds for which the plates were made and ready when Mr. Cleveland came into office?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know when the plates were made. I know when they were put into execution. [Laughter.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Cleveland has stated in his book, over his own signature, that, as a matter of fact, those plates were all prepared before his predecessor went out of office.

Mr. FORDNEY. I believe that statement has been denied time and time again; but I admired Mr. Cleveland, I believe, more than the average man in his party did.

Mr. POU. Then the gentleman is willing, I imagine, to accept the late President's statement as to the proof of that fact.

Mr. FORDNEY. My friend, let me tell you this much. You know, and so do I, that the Wilson tariff bill did not bring sufficient revenue to this Government to pay our running expenses, and the present tariff law does. There are no such conditions existing to-day warranting the calling of Congress together in an extra session to undo something that the Republican Party has done, as existed then, and I will leave it to the world to decide. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I must get along a little faster. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] to one thing. They are very earnest in their efforts to bring about the adoption of Canadian reciprocity. They are both protectionists. Just whether they can see beyond the limits of the State of Connecticut and the State of Massachusetts at this time I am not going to say. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL rose.

Mr. FORDNEY. Just one moment. Let me say to you, you wanted free trade in leather, and you voted for protection on shoes. I have repeatedly said, and I repeat now, that any step toward a reduction of our duties was only a step toward free trade. You are in favor of Canadian reciprocity, and here comes a full-born child of free trade, a bill that puts shoes on the free list and leather on the free list, and I do wish it also put other things produced in New England on the free list. [Applause and laughter.] I am going to ask you if you are going to vote for that bill. I am going to introduce a bill, and I give notice now, and no better protectionist has ever lived than is found in me—and I hope my Democratic friends will support it—to put ships on the free list, so that American goods may be carried between two American ports by any foreign ship, and we will see how New England will like that.

Mr. HILL. New England men have fully as good eyesight as the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not doubt that.

Mr. HILL. And can see precisely as far into the tariff system, and I challenge him now to vote with me in accordance with the principles laid down in the Republican national platform, that the true measure of protection is the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, and if he does it once, it will be the first time he ever did it in his life. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, my friend is an elegant gentleman; he is a splendid fellow, no better lived—though some people do not know it—but let me ask him to reason out this. I happened to be a member of the committee on resolutions at the last Republican national convention——

Mr. HILL. Then the gentleman ought to be bound by the declaration.

Mr. FORDNEY. Are you?

Mr. HILL. I am. On manufactures from New England and lumber from Michigan, and on wheat also and every other product that we have in the United States.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, now, do not get excited, because you are in error. That platform says that the Republican Party proposes to give protection to American industry a tariff wall sufficiently high to offset the difference in the cost of production here and abroad and in addition thereto a fair profit.

Mr. HILL. Oh, yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Where in the name of God is there any protection for a profit in the free trade for which you vote?

Mr. HILL. Does the gentleman wish an answer now?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; come on, I am not afraid.

Mr. HILL. I will ask the gentleman whether the figures on the other side do not also include a fair profit for them?

Mr. FORDNEY. Suppose the cost there was identical with the cost here?

Mr. HILL. Then I would have no duty. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Wait a minute. Where is your profit? Figure it out if you can.

Mr. HILL. Where is their profit? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Let them keep their own market and we will keep ours. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HILL. We would with the addition of from $3 to $5 a ton in our favor across the ocean.

Mr. FORDNEY. My friend, you wanted to reduce the duty on wool, did you not? I had some wrestling with you, and one day you got angry—— [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. I think we were both a little excited.

Mr. FORDNEY. You excited everybody in your presence. [Laughter.] You said that you had paid $12,000 losses on an industry in the last 90 days. You said that much to me.

Mr. HILL. That is small.

Mr. FORDNEY. And you wanted the duty changed so you might not incur further loss.

Mr. HILL. Not at all.

Mr. FORDNEY. What the devil did you want it changed for, then? [Laughter and applause.] Now, let me go further; let me show you the lack of wisdom in that resolution in the Republican platform adopted at Chicago, which I as a member of the committee protested against. I have always tried to be fair, just, and equitable, and have stood by the majority of my party, and I will continue to do so except on some measures which I protest against and refuse to go in caucus to be bound upon.

Mr. HILL. I will stand——

Mr. FORDNEY. Wait until I finish this sentence. That resolution provided for a duty sufficiently high to offset the difference in cost here and abroad, and in addition thereto a fair profit to our producers. Let me call the gentleman's attention to this fact: There is an abundance of evidence on file, sir, that labor in Germany, France, and England receives about one-half the pay the same class of labor receives in this country. We will say when labor receives $1.50 a day in our factories such labor receives but 75 cents in England, Germany, and France for the same class of labor.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield——

Mr. FORDNEY. In a minute; and I have in my possession a consular report where the American consul in Belgium had gone to the cotton mills in that country and found that the average laborer receives an average pay of but 18 cents a day. Now, then, going across the water the other way, what do you find? You find Japanese labor working for from 6 to 15 cents a day and Chinese labor from 3 to 10 cents a day in gold. Tell me, sir, how you are going to fix a tariff wall the same for all the nations of the world to offset the difference of cost here and abroad, unless you legislate against the cheapest paid labor in the world and under such circumstances then, sir, your tariff wall is prohibitive to England, France, and Germany. It is an impossibility. It sounds well to the ear of a man who does not give consideration to these facts. I protested against it as being unwise legislation, and I would like to have the gentleman in his time in his speech, and he will have all the time he wants, to answer that question.

Mr. HOBSON. I do not wish——

Mr. FORDNEY. I will answer a question. When I get through with my remarks I will answer any questions that may be asked me.

Mr. HOBSON. I merely desired to ask the gentleman in connection with that much-discussed proposition of the relative cost of labor in America and abroad, whether it is not a fact that the American laborer produces more than the laborer abroad, and for what he produces to-day receives less, broadly speaking, in most of the wage-earning departments of labor, receives less per unit of product, than the laborer abroad does, and is therefore the poorest paid laborer in the world?

Mr. FORDNEY. I think the gentleman is away off in his conclusions. I have not the time to furnish you statistics here to that effect, but if you will give me time I think that I can convince the gentleman absolutely that he is incorrect. If he will pardon me, I will go on.

Now, then, upon the question of hay I wish to say a few words. Let me take up a few of the items mentioned in this bill. There is a duty at the present time of $4 a ton on hay. The State in which I live is a great producer of that product. Some $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 worth of hay was produced in the State of Michigan last year. I have here a hay trade journal, published at Canajoharie, N. Y., April 7, and I have several copies as well, and the prices given in each copy are practically the same, varying not more than 25 or 30 cents per ton on hay in our markets for several weeks. But I want to call the attention of the gentleman here to the fact that on April 7 the price of hay in Boston was $22 per ton; in New York, $21.50 per ton; in Jersey City, $21.50 per ton; in Brooklyn, $21 per ton; in Philadelphia, $20.50 per ton; in Pittsburg, Pa., $19.25 per ton; and in Montreal, Canada, mind you, the same grade of hay is quoted at $11 a ton. The duty is $4 per ton, and the freight on hay from Montreal, Canada, to Pittsburg is 23 cents per 100 pounds in carload lots of 10 tons, making $4.60 freight, and freight and duty together are $8.60. This deducted from $19.25, the price of hay in Pittsburg, left the Canadian farmer $10.65 a ton for his hay f. o. b. Montreal.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman now yield for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; if the gentleman will make it short.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Is the gentleman aware that upon hay No. 1 the price on January 2 at Toronto was $18 and in New York $16?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I am not.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. That is a fact.

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, there were some conditions of the roads or scarcity of the article in the market that caused it, and it must have been due to some abnormal condition, because the price here in this trade journal runs about the same, running along week after week, just as I have given it to you, and any man will find by searching the record that the price of hay in Montreal is always below our price in this country just about the amount of the duty and the freight. Then will any man in favor of this measure contend that by removing the duty of $4 per ton upon hay it will not reduce the price of hay in our market or increase it in Canada?

It has been stated time and time again, and by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], I believe, on Saturday, that this bill will not cause a reduction of prices in this country on farm products; that it will not injure the farmers. There is only one way, in my opinion, that this bill could injure the farmers, and that is by lowering the price of his farm products, and if the importation of Canadian products into this country does not lower the price of the products of the farmer, it certainly will not lower it to the consumer. And then, who is benefited? And if the friends of this measure who stand here and contend that it is not in any way going to injure the farmer, I ask who are you legislating for? You are legislating for the Canadian absolutely.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. COOPER. I am much interested in the gentleman's speech, and if he will permit me I desire to ask him a question on the topic which he discussed a moment ago—the question of reasonable profits guaranteed by the platform of the Republican Party. I am a protectionist, and always have been, and the gentleman is a very strong protectionist. I believe that the first time that principle ever was enunciated in the platform of the Republican Party was in the Chicago convention of 1908—that is, the provision for a reasonable profit. It never was in our national platform until 1908. Is not that true?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know, sir; I presume that is right.

Mr. COOPER. Yes. I think the previous platforms simply provided for an equalization of competitive conditions by the imposition of a tariff.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will say to the gentleman, please make your question as short as you can. I will appreciate it.

Mr. COOPER. Now, then, after we have established the cost price abroad and the cost price here, and imposed the tariff to equalize conditions, how much of a tariff is to be imposed in order to yield a reasonable profit? And is the reasonable profit to be 5 per cent, or is it to be 6 per cent, or is it to be 8 per cent, or is it to be 10 per cent upon a particular business? Is it to be the same on all businesses? How is that to be adjusted?

Mr. FORDNEY. My idea is this: That since 1897 we have had a tariff law upon our statute books under which the American people, both labor and capital, have been prosperous. I am old enough to remember back—my memory is not so short that it does not run back to 1894, 1895, and 1896—when conditions were different, and when we operated under a different tariff law, when we all suffered financial loss, while labor was the greatest sufferer in the land. I believe that our tariff laws which have been on our statute books since August, 1897, are sufficient to warrant a fair profit to the American people. I contend and insist that we should continue under that policy until we have been fully convinced that other conditions are necessary.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit just another question right there?

Mr. FORDNEY. In just a minute. I had not finished on hay. I want to complete my answer to the gentleman. Under the Wilson bill the duty on hay was $2 a ton. Under existing law and under the law known as the Dingley tariff law the duty has been $4 a ton. Under previous laws the duty was, as I remember it now, $4 a ton, which was the rate under the McKinley law.

Some gentlemen say that if this tariff law is abrogated it will not injure the farmer or his products. For three years during the life of the Wilson bill—four years, including a year of suspense—we imported 625,000 tons of hay from Canada, and for the last three years we have imported only 113,000 tons. The rate is $4 per ton. It was $2 per ton then. There was a great increase of importations under free trade—no; not under free trade, but under a lower rate of duty—a much greater importation then than now. Do not those figures show that by reducing the duty we shall certainly have increased importations? And if Canada does not expect to send more of her goods to our market in consequence of the reduction of these duties, why is she in favor of this reduction? She can change her tariff laws on our goods going into Canada at any time without our having anything to say about it at all, as we can change the rate of duty on her goods coming into this country.

Now, my friends, another great and important industry in our State is the production of beans. We produced some $15,000,000 worth of beans in the State of Michigan last year. Under the Wilson bill the duty on beans was 20 per cent ad valorem. That is my recollection now. Under existing law the rate of duty is 45 cents per bushel. For the first year under the Wilson bill we imported 1,160,000 bushels of beans from Canada. How much was it last year? For the last three or four years we imported less than 150,000 bushels a year. Will any man, then, contend that by lowering the duty on beans Canadian beans will not be brought into competition with American-grown beans—that great and magnificent crop grown in this country?

England produces beans for export for almost the whole world, and she has a preferential rate of duty into Canada below that which is given to us. I ask you, my friends, what will prevent Canada from purchasing for home consumption English-grown beans and dumping into our market her whole bean crop? Oh, it is absolute nonsense, it seems to me, to say that a reduction of the duty on beans will not increase the importation of beans from Canada, and thus lower our prices.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; I will.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Does the gentleman know that the Massachusetts Cost of Living Commission found that beans brought a higher price in the markets of Canada than in the United States?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I do not know it.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. It is a fact.

Mr. FORDNEY. If so, how, then, can Canadians send to our markets 150,000 bushels a year and pay a duty of 45 cents a bushel? Explain that, if you will. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] spoke about cotton. Somebody on this side of the House said to him, "If you will vote for free lumber, I will vote for free sugar." He said, "Why, I will vote for both of them." Did you ever see anything that had the word "free" attached to it that he would not vote for?

Let me call his attention to cotton. Although it is not in this bill, it is discussed in this Senate Document 862. Let me say to the gentleman from North Carolina that I know this much about the cotton industry in the South, that before there were any cotton mills in the Southern States raw cotton sold down there at 5 cents a pound. I was there and I know what I am talking about. In 1892 and 1893 there were practically no cotton mills in the South, and the southern farmers, for a normal crop of 10,000,000 bales, received 5 cents per pound, or $300,000,000. What is the price to-day and what are the conditions down there? There are in the South to-day nearly 11,000,000 spindles at work in the cotton mills, employing American capital and American labor. In speaking of the New England States the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] said they were going to transfer the cotton mills from New England to the South, or words to that effect. There are 15,000,000 spindles at work in the cotton mills of New England, a total of 26,000,000 spindles in the United States. The price of cotton to-day is high, largely, I contend, the result of competition between American cotton mills and the foreign demand for cotton. Ten million bales, a normal crop in the South to-day, instead of bringing $300,000,000 to southern farmers as it did when the price was 5 cents per pound, now bring to those farmers $900,000,000. [Applause.]

There is a cotton mill in a little town in Mississippi that I am familiar with. I went through that mill and saw every part of it to familiarize myself with it. There are 20,000 spindles at work in that mill. Based on that number of spindles, there are more than 500 cotton mills in the South to-day working on raw cotton raised in this country, employing American labor, that was not employed in the South 20 years ago or 17 years ago.

In the face of the fact that there are 26,000,000 spindles working in the cotton mills of the United States to-day, we exported from this country directly to Europe and to Japan a large quantity of raw cotton and purchased back from those countries last year $86,000,000 worth of cotton fabrics. Do you believe it is a good plan for a farmer in Jones County, Miss., who raises cotton on a farm adjoining the city limits of a town where there is a cotton factory, to send his raw cotton abroad and employ Belgian labor that receives 18 cents a day, and then purchase a pair of overalls when they come back to this country, made by that cheaper labor in Belgium, instead of encouraging the production of cotton or the building of another factory in this country and keeping the money at home? Oh, my friends, if you will go down South and preach to the southern cotton growers what you preached here on Saturday, and give them the facts and figures, you will make a Republican of every southern white man.

The gentleman from North Carolina said he would vote for free sugar. Sugar is not in the bill, but it bears upon this subject. We have but one trade treaty upon our statute books to-day, and God forbid that there ever be another like it. That is Cuban reciprocity. I have talked so much about that subject that I am called a crank on sugar, but let me call your attention briefly to a few facts and figures. I was in Congress at the time that bill became a law. I protested against it and voted against it then. Thank heaven it never became a law by my vote. The balance of trade between this country and Cuba at that time was $8,000,000 a year in favor of Cuba. Last year it had grown to the enormous sum of $70,043,000. Let me tell the gentlemen on this side and on that side of the House what you did when you voted for Cuban reciprocity. You lowered the duty on sugar coming from Cuba 20 per cent below the rate paid on sugar coming from all other countries, which are all countries except our insular possessions. You reduced it 20 per cent. We have imported from Cuba during the life of that treaty 11,500,000 tons of sugar. This reduction of 20 per cent below the Dingley rate on that sugar sums up $77,510,000 the 1st day of January last lost to the United States Treasury.

Have the consumers of sugar in this country purchased their sugar for any less money than they did before? No; notwithstanding the fact that the world's supply of sugar before and after the adoption of that treaty has been plenty, notwithstanding we have never had a famine on sugar or a short crop, so that the country's supplies would be advanced on that account, we have not bought sugar for a fraction of a cent less.

This is a step in the same direction. Do not forget when you voted for a reduction of the duty on sugar coming from Cuba, and when you vote for the reduction of the duty on goods coming from any country in the world, instead of voting in the interest of the consumers of this country you are voting money into the pockets of foreigners or some one other than our consumers.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield, yes.

Mr. KAHN. I want to call the gentleman's attention to this fact, that under the reciprocity treaty with the Hawaiian Islands, which was entered into during the seventies, sugar was brought in free from those islands. The duty was removed entirely. The result was that the sugar was not reduced in price to the consumer a fraction of a cent, but a number of men who did the importing became multimillionaires as a consequence.

Mr. FORDNEY. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion. In this country we have produced from cane and beets sugar as follows: Taking the same value for the total of all the crops mentioned from 1879 to date, about $4.70 per hundred pounds, we produced $8,535,000 worth. Ten years later, in 1889, we produced $14,000,000 worth. In 1899 we produced $20,000,000 worth. Just then the great beet-sugar industry took hold under protection guaranteed in the Republican platform adopted at the St. Louis convention in 1896, and the next four years, 1904, our crops had grown from $20,000,000 worth to $63,000,000 worth, and in 1909 to $76,655,000. It costs, in round numbers, to produce sugar from beets $3.90 a hundred pounds. It costs more in the Northern States than in the arid-land district to produce a pound of sugar from beets. In Michigan it costs about 4 cents to produce a pound. I have figures that will show what, under free trade, if the gentleman from North Carolina could have his way, the Sugar Trust could produce refined sugar for per pound if made from foreign imported raw sugar.

On the 13th of April, according to Willett & Gray's Trade Sugar Journal, sugar in bond in New York is quoted at $1.91 a hundred pounds. The duty on that imported sugar from duty paying countries, except Cuba, is $1.68½, and it costs 40 cents per hundred pounds to refine this sugar, or a total cost of $3.99½, practically 4 cents per pound. But, my friends, our imported sugar from duty paying countries comes principally from Cuba. We imported about 1,750,000 tons last year, while three-quarters of it came from Cuba. Deducting 20 per cent of this duty from the Dingley law, which rate we give to Cuba, and the Sugar Trust can produce a pound of refined sugar and put it on the market in the United States for $3.65 per hundred pounds, or about one-third of a cent below what it can be produced for in this country. Remove the duty on sugar altogether and the great American Sugar Refining Co. and the Arbuckles and others in the refining business can import from foreign countries all the sugar we consume, reduce the price below what sugar can be produced for in this country, and refine enough to wipe out of existence their competitors, and up will go the price again as of old.

And so when the gentleman from North Carolina says that he will vote for free trade on sugar, I am safe in saying that the sugar-refining companies in this country would pay a million dollars a head for men of the same opinion, until sugar is put on the free list. I impute no dishonest motives to him or any other man at all. Do not so misunderstand me, but men who will vote for free sugar are misguided. That is the point. It is well known that the Sugar Trusts of this country have been recently prosecuted for dishonest methods, and I say anything that will give them an advantage over the domestic industry they would move heaven and earth to bring about. So I criticize my friend from North Carolina for being a free trader on sugar. I am not.

Now, I am going to close. I have detained the House altogether too long, much longer than I had intended, but I have tried in my plain way to express to you my judgment about the enactment of this law, to show that if it is put upon our statute books it means the death knell to the farmers of this country.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman stated awhile ago in answer to an inquiry of mine that he would touch upon the lumber question before he concluded.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I had forgotten. I will do that briefly. Let me say that in this treaty it is proposed to put rough lumber coming from Canada upon the free list, and, again, the treaty reduces the duty on dressed lumber, according to the amount of work done upon it, below the prices fixed in the Payne tariff law. If you will take last year's prices of the imports of lumber from Canada, you will find that the rates fixed in this treaty are about 5 per cent ad valorem, while our lumber of the same grade going into Canada, with the same amount of work put upon it, must pay 25 per cent ad valorem. Canadians do not change their rate on lumber at all by the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i." Gentlemen, I say that it is absolutely unfair to put the product of that great, magnificent industry, the product of the mills, upon the free list unless you are going to help the consumer, and I ask you whether or not the reductions recently made inured to the benefit of the consumers?

I have information in my possession from a gentleman in Pittsburg whom I know well, a lumber dealer, who recently went into Canada and contracted for 10,000,000 feet of lumber, white pine, to be brought to this country, and before the parties in Canada would close their contract with him for this lumber they insisted upon and did write into that contract a provision that if this treaty becomes a law he shall pay $1.25 per thousand feet more for his lumber. I can produce a copy of that contract if necessary.

Mr. LANGLEY. I have heard it frequently contended that the kinds of lumber produced in Canada and shipped into the United States, or that would be under free lumber with Canada, will not compete with the grades of lumber produced in this country.

Mr. FORDNEY. There is not a grade of lumber made from any tree cut in the forests of Canada that does not come directly into competition with the same grade of lumber produced in this country and in nearly every State in the Union where lumber is produced.

Mr. LANGLEY. Does the gentleman not think, then, that if this treaty goes into operation it will necessarily depress the price of lumber in the United States?

Mr. FORDNEY. It will do one of two things, as I have contended all along in my argument. It will either lower the price of the article to the consumer in this country or it will not. If it does lower the price to the consumer in this country, then it injures the industry and the twelve hundred thousand men employed in the sawmills of this country. If it does not lower the price to the consumer, no one will be benefited but the Canadian.

Mr. LANGLEY. Just one more question. Was that not the effect upon the lumber industry in the United States under the free-lumber provision of the Wilson bill?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, whether that bill was responsible for it or not I will not now attempt to argue, but it is my belief that it was. Prices were low, and the lumber industry was in bad shape. A great many concerns in the country went into bankruptcy or into the hands of a receiver. Labor employed in the camps received $16 per month and board, whereas labor now receives $40 and $45 per month and board. It was the same in every other industry in the country.

Let me go a step further. In this bill it is proposed to put print paper and pulp on the free list. At the same time every Province in Canada has placed an embargo upon her pulp wood. There are 824 paper mills in this country with $400,000,000 capital invested. There are thousands of men employed in those paper and pulp mills. They produced last year nearly $300,000,000 worth of product. Many of those mills largely depend now for their supply of wood upon Canada, yet in this treaty Canada absolutely refuses to permit the changing of her laws in a single Province to let us have her raw material for our paper mills in this country, but at the same time this bill proposes to put print paper on the free list.

Take out that provision of the law which puts print paper on the free list and there is not a Republican newspaper or magazine in the broad land that will not oppose it. Every one of them would rise up in arms against the treaty. I have been reliably informed that William R. Hearst, of New York, a prominent newspaper publisher, purchases 300 tons of paper daily. If he believed that the removal of the duty on print paper, which is about $4.90 per ton—say, for easy figuring, $5 per ton—if he believes that he can buy his print paper for just that much less money, the amount of the duty, which would be $1,500 per day on his raw material, do you expect him, Mr. Hearst, to oppose Canadian reciprocity? No; he is no such philanthropist. Every newspaper in the land has a selfish interest. They are striking a blow at the agriculturist to get their print paper free and discriminating against one of the most important industries in the land.

Gentlemen, I thank you, and I have detained you already too long. [Loud applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, how much time has the gentleman occupied?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has occupied 2 hours and 2 minutes, making a total for that side of 3 hours and 27 minutes occupied.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an act passed by the parliament of New Brunswick and approved by the governor of that Province on Thursday last. It goes into effect on October 1 next. The title of this measure is as follows:

An act respecting the manufacture of spruce and other pulp wood cut on Crown lands.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may print this act in the RECORD in connection with the few remarks that I may make.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Florida forces me to read the act.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. All right; read it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I shall first take the opportunity of commenting upon it.

As you all know, the New Brunswick forests are principally owned by that Province, and all rights to cut timber are leased from time to time to private parties. By the terms of the new act every license to cut spruce or other soft wood, trees or timber, except pine and poplar, "shall contain and be subject to the condition that all such timber cut under the authority or permission of such license or permit shall be manufactured in Canada; that is to say, into merchantable pulp or paper or into sawn lumber, woodenware utensils, or other articles of commerce or merchandise as distinguished from the said spruce or other timber in its raw or unmanufactured state."

In other words, at the very moment when our political necessity is forcing us to make one-sided concessions to Canada, at the very moment when we are engaged in reducing our agricultural and other tariff schedules under the specious pretense of reciprocal agreement, that is the time chosen by a great Province of Canada for striking a blow at our manufacturers. After October 1 next we shall no longer be able to import our wooden raw material from New Brunswick. What a comment this is on the doctrine that this reciprocity agreement will give us cheaper raw materials! Its first result is to forbid us raw materials altogether.

No one knows better than I that these remarks are falling on deaf ears. No one knows better than I that New Brunswick lumber is not manufactured in the South, whose relentless grip has been fastened on this branch of the Government. History, however, has an unpleasant way of repeating itself. Already at least one great Province of the Dominion has adopted the Canadian policy which existed during the continuance of our reciprocity treaty of 1854. To those of you who heard the debate in this House two months ago I need not recall the fact that by unfriendly legislation throughout the continuance of the Elgin treaty Canada contrived to render valueless the concessions which she made us.

Now, I shall read the act:

An act respecting the manufacture of spruce and other pulp wood cut on Crown lands.

Be it enacted by the lieutenant governor and legislative assembly as follows:

1. All sales of timber licenses by the surveyor general, which shall hereafter be made and which shall convey the right to cut and remove spruce or other soft wood trees, or timber, other than pine and poplar suitable for manufacturing pulp or paper, and all licenses or permits to cut such timber on the limits and berths so sold, and all claims entered into, or other authority conferred by the said surveyor general, by virtue of which such timber may be cut upon lands of the Crown, shall be so made, issued, or granted subject to the condition set forth in the first regulation of schedule A of this act, and it shall be sufficient if such condition be cited as "the manufacturing condition" in all such licenses, permits, agreement, or other writing.

2. The resolutions set out in schedule A of this act are hereby approved and confirmed and declared to be legal and valid to all intents and purposes, and the sale shall apply to all licenses or permits hereafter issued, whether for the first time or in renewal of licenses or permits heretofore issued or granted.

3. The lieutenant governor in council may make any further or additional regulations necessary to enable the surveyor general to carry into effect the object and intent of the regulations contained in schedule A.

4. No licensee of any timber license or permit shall hereafter sell, assign, or in any way transfer to any other person or company the interest of such licensee therein under such license until such licensee shall have paid to the Province the sum of $4 per mile.

5. The first three sections of this act and the regulations thereby approved shall not come into force until the 1st day of October, A. D. 1911.

SCHEDULE A.

1. Every timber license or permit conferring authority to cut spruce or other soft wood trees, or timber, not being pine or poplar suitable for manufacturing pulp or paper, on the ungranted lands of the Crown shall contain and be subject to the condition that all such timber cut under the authority or permission of such license or permit shall be manufactured in Canada; that is to say, into merchantable pulp or paper, or into sawn lumber, woodenware utensils, or other articles of commerce or merchandise, as distinguished from the said spruce or other timber in its raw or unmanufactured state; and such condition shall be kept and observed by the holder or holders of any such timber licenses or permit who shall cut or cause to be cut spruce or other soft wood trees, or timber, not being pine or poplar, suitable for manufacturing pulp or paper under the authority thereof, and by any other person or persons who shall cut or cause to be cut any of such wood trees or timber, under the authority thereof, and all such wood, trees or timber, cut into logs or lengths or otherwise shall be manufactured in Canada as aforesaid. It is hereby declared that the cutting of spruce or other soft wood trees, or timber, not being pine or poplar suitable for manufacturing pulp or paper, into cord wood or other lengths, is not manufacturing same within the meaning of this regulation.

2. Should any holder of a timber license or permit, or any servant or agent of such holder, or any person acting for him or under his authority or permission, violate or refuse to keep and observe the condition named in the preceding regulation, then, and in such case, the license or permit to cut spruce or other softwood trees or timber not being pine or poplar on the limit or berth, territory, lot or lots included in the license or permit, and on which or on any part of which there was a breach of such regulation, or a refusal to observe or keep the same, shall be suspended and held in abeyance and shall not be reissued, nor shall a new license or permit issue unless and until so directed by the Lieutenant Governor in Council and then only upon such terms and conditions as the Lieutenant Governor in Council may impose.

3. The surveyor general, his officers, servants, and agents may do all things necessary to prevent a breach of the aforesaid condition and to secure compliance therewith and may for such purpose take, seize, hold, and detain all logs, timber, or wood so cut as aforesaid, and which it is made to appear to the surveyor general it is not the intention of the licensee, owner or holder, or person in possession of, to manufacture or cause to be manufactured as aforesaid in Canada, or to dispose of to others who will have the same so manufactured in Canada until security shall be given to His Majesty satisfactory to the surveyor general that the said condition will be kept and observed and that such logs, timber, or wood will be manufactured in Canada as aforesaid; and in the event of the refusal on the part of the licensee, owner, or holder, or person in possession of such logs, timber, or wood to give such security, within four weeks after notice of such seizure and demand of security by or on behalf of the surveyor general, then the surveyor general may sell or cause to be sold such logs, timber, or wood by public auction after due advertisement to some person or persons who will give such security to His Majesty as the surveyor general may require that such logs, timber, or wood shall be manufactured in Canada. The proceeds of such logs, timber, or wood shall, after such seizure and sale, and any sum due and owing to His Majesty for or in respect of any timber dues, ground rent, or on account of the purchase of any timber or timber berths by the owner, licensee, or holder of a permit, or other person who has cut or caused to be cut such logs, timber, or wood, or who is the owner or holder of the same, to be paid over to the person entitled to the same.

4. Provided, nevertheless, That nothing in the preceding regulations which requires spruce or other timber, not being pine, suitable for manufacturing pulp or paper, to be manufactured in Canada as aforesaid shall apply to logs, timber, or wood cut and in use in Canada for fuel, building, or other purposes for which logs, timber, or wood, in the unmanufactured state are or may be used.

5. After seizure the burden of proving that the timber is to be manufactured in Canada shall be on the owners of such timber.

6. Where the timber to be seized is mixed up with other timber, the whole of the timber may be attached and dealt with accordingly until satisfactorily separated.

During the reading of the above the following colloquy occurred:

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I can not understand the gentleman. We do not know what he is reading. I will make the point of order the gentleman must read so that we must understand it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, is the point of order sustained?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I am going to insist that this House do not degenerate into a circus, even if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] is playing the chief rôle.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. It is the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] who has issued tickets for admission to that circus. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I insist that I have a right to hear what is going on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already ruled that there is no rule by which the Chair can compel a Member of the House to read in any other manner than he himself sees fit. Therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Does the Chair mean to hold that Members can get up on this floor and read a document or make a speech in some jargon that is absolutely unintelligible, under the rules of the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair means to hold what the Chair has already stated, that there is no rule by which the Chair can control the manner in which a gentleman reads a paper in his own time.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Whether it is intelligible or not?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I do not suppose that the gentleman from Florida means to be annoying in objecting to printing this telegram in the RECORD, but I maintain it is an important thing that the House should have in its possession to-morrow a full statement of that act, passed by the New Brunswick Legislature on Thursday. For that reason, inasmuch as I am allowed only five minutes, I am reading rapidly, so as to get the matter into the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact, was not my time taken up in the discussion of the parliamentary inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chairman had that in mind, and permitted the gentleman to go beyond the strict five minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more.

After the reading:

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DALZELL. How much time has the gentleman occupied?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] now yield some time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, two months ago the Canadian reciprocity agreement went through this House with an overwhelming majority, only to meet an untimely end in the august body at the other end of this Capitol, done to death by the standpatters, and by them unwept, unhonored, and unsung.

When I voted for this bill, as a member of the minority, I did so because I believed it was the most that we could hope to obtain from a Republican administration. But now that we are members of the majority, I shall vote for it because it is the first step in the Democratic plan of tariff reform. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I am glad of an opportunity to follow my friend from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. From sitting two years on the Ways and Means Committee with him I have learned that whenever I am on the opposite side of an economic question from the gentleman from Michigan I am bound to be in the right, so that when I follow him upon this floor, taking the opposite side of this question, I know that I am standing upon solid and substantial ground. The gentleman from Michigan is the highest protectionist of them all. He is the author of the now historic phrase that for him "the best tariff revision would be to make the Dingley rates the bottom and the blue vault of heaven the top." Now, after the Napoleon of the standpatters, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], shall have fled from the field with his broken and disheartened cohorts, the gentleman from Michigan, playing the part of Cambronne, will stand there with the last remnants of the Old Guard, ready to die, but never to surrender.

He has favored us to-day with a rehash of all the old protection arguments to which we have listened for now these 10 years past—arguments which the country repudiated at the last congressional election.

Chief among his arguments was the threadbare, time-worn Republican claim as to the effect of the Wilson tariff law upon the articles protected by the present tariff. He says that the price of wheat went down under the Wilson law all on account of the tariff protection being taken off, but he neglects to state that in those days the price of cotton was down to 6 cents, and cotton had no tariff tax upon it. He neglects to state, what so often has been stated from this side of the Chamber, and much better than I can formulate it, that the financial depression of those days, in so far as it was due to any legislation whatever, was due entirely to the conduct of affairs by the preceding Republican administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And he fails to call attention to the oft-stated fact that the issue of bonds debited against President Cleveland was an inheritance that fell to President Cleveland from the preceding Republican Secretary of the Treasury, who left a bankrupt Treasury and had the plates already engraved from which those bonds were to be printed and issued.

Now, the gentleman from Michigan, in coming down to a discussion of the present tariff act in comparison with the Wilson tariff law, states the Wilson tariff law did not bring in enough revenue to run the Government. The reason why that is so is because an integral part of the Wilson tariff law was the income-tax provision, passed at the same time, but the income-tax law was then declared unconstitutional. At the present moment the movement throughout the United States to enable us to amend the Constitution so as to place an income-tax law upon the statute books is pressing to a triumphant conclusion, and in my belief it will be the best means of accomplishing a genuine tariff reform that this country has ever seen.

But the gentleman from Michigan went further and made the bold statement, by way of contrast, that the present tariff law, the Payne-Aldrich Act, does produce enough revenue to run the Government. If the gentleman would look over the most recent receipts at the Treasury, he would find that the present tariff law is running some $12,000,000 behind what was expected, and that there would be a present deficit in the Treasury if it were not for the increase in receipts from internal-revenue taxation, amounting to about $16,000,000 in round figures.

On Saturday afternoon we had the pleasure of listening to the maiden speech of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS], and I think that every Member of the House wishes him well in his new position in this House. But it struck me, in listening to the academic discussion of the history of farm protection by the gentleman from Maine, that he has served so long at the right hand of the Speaker that he has grown a little bit out of touch with the farmers of the United States. The gentleman from Maine rehearsed for our benefit the experiences of Germany and England, which he says we should follow. He recited for our benefit the tariff law of Germany, which he says protects the agricultural products of that nation, and he represented to us the benefits that that had brought to the German farmer.

But the gentleman from Maine, in describing the dramatic manner in which Bismarck gave up his free-trade position and gave himself over hand and foot to the agragrians, failed to say that he did so, not at the demand of the farmers of Germany, but at the demand of the agragrians, as they are called—the great noblemen of Prussia, the great landed proprietors who control all the farming lands of the Prussian kingdom, and who, while retaining all the profit that they can make out of the tariff law or other restrictive measures for themselves, grind down their tenant farmers in sweat into the soil of that land. And I will tell the gentleman from Maine that the restrictions placed upon Germany by the agragrians are the chief cause of the present economic discontent in the German Empire.

Now, as to England. The gentleman from Maine advanced an argument, recently prepared and presented by the tariff commission of England, in favor of placing a tax upon agricultural products. Why, the gentleman from Maine is evidently not aware of the fact that protection is as dead as a doornail in England to-day, and has never been more so through the whole history of the British Empire.

He seems to make use of the recommendations of the British tariff board in very much the same way that standpatters in this country hope to make use of the recommendations of our so-called Tariff Board. Our Tariff Board is devised to continue the reign of protection. Let me show you what I believe would be the effect of the application by the Tariff Board of the principle announced in the last Republican platform of the proper method of establishing tariff rates. This says that it should be the difference in the cost of production here and abroad plus a reasonable profit for the manufacturer. Now, I will tell you exactly where that would lead you. If you applied that strictly, if you ascertained exactly the difference in the cost of production here and abroad, and then added a reasonable profit for the American manufacturer, what you would bring about would be an absolutely prohibitive protection; because if you have eliminated the difference in cost of production here and abroad you have destroyed the ability of anybody outside of the United States to send anything in here, and then you have driven the thing home by adding a reasonable profit for the American manufacturer.

Now, certainly if this so-called Tariff Board of ours, which is operating at enormous expense, with great delay and with complete secrecy, is to carry out the dictates of that principle, we will not be able to collect any tariff revenues whatever, because everything manufactured here will be nourished behind a prohibitive protection in the United States.

Now, to return just a moment to the argument of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS]. Coming down from general statements of policy he selected two industries which he was particularly interested in seeing retained under what he believes to be proper protection. One of them was cheese and the other one was potatoes. Now, as a matter of fact, in the year 1910 we exported to Canada over $45,000 worth of cheese, and the same year we only imported from Canada $27,000 worth of cheese. Now, why do you suppose Americans sent their cheese to Canada? Because they got a better market there. That is why they sent it there. They did not send it there for fun, or to amuse themselves, but to make more profit, and the movement of cheese toward Canada was three times as big as the movement of cheese from Canada toward the United States.

Here is what has been happening in cheese. In 1850 the cheese produced on farms and ranges in the United States amounted to 105,000,000 pounds; in 1860, 103,000,000 pounds; in 1870, 53,000,000 pounds; in 1880, 27,000,000 pounds; in 1890, 18,000,000 pounds; and in 1900, 16,000,000 pounds. The fact is that so far as the farmer is concerned cheese making is going out of existence.

Mr. MADDEN. Does that include the so-called cheese factories?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. No; I am just about to come to that. The production of cheese in the United States is passing out of the hands of the farmers and into the hands of the factories. In 1905, which was the last year for which we have the statistics, the cheese factories in the United States produced 317,000,000 pounds, of which we exported 10,000,000 pounds. Under that system will you tell me how the farmer of Maine or New England is going to be injured by free trade in cheese with Canada?

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. FINLEY). Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. MADDEN. As a matter of fact, the factory gets the product from which the cheese is made from the farmer, does it not?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. And the profit is divided between the farmer and the factory in the cost of the manufacture?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The farmer can not both eat his cake and have it, too. When he comes to complain about the difference in duties between cattle and meat, then the farmer says the meat is the product of the manufacturer and not the farmer's product. And so it is with cheese. As a matter of fact, free trade in cheese with Canada is not going to hurt the New England farmer one cent.

Mr. MALBY. Will my colleague give way for a question on that?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Certainly.

Mr. MALBY. Is the gentleman able to state to the House the difference of the market price in the United States, for instance, New York and Canada, during the last few years?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I will be glad to have the gentleman furnish the figures with which he is evidently brimming. It is difficult to obtain comparative prices, because the two countries make different kinds of cheese.

Mr. MALBY. I mean the great bulk of cheese, the usual American cheese. It is that to which I refer, and it is that to which the figures refer. Is it not a well-known fact that the difference in price between Canada and the United States is substantially the amount of the tariff?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. If that were the case, the consumers would benefit very much in the United States by taking off the tariff, but I believe the gentleman is mistaken. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS] has kindly handed me the report of the cost of living by the Massachusetts commission, in which the prices of cheese are given, as between Detroit and Windsor, Boston and Montreal, Bangor and St. John. It is 18 cents in Detroit and 18 cents in Windsor.

Mr. MALBY. Will the gentleman give way for another inquiry?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I will.

Mr. MALBY. For what year is that?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Nineteen hundred and ten.

Mr. MALBY. Is that the price that the farmers held it for?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. That is the price to the producer.

Mr. MALBY. That is a higher price than it is ever sold for——

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I see it is the price to the consumer.

Mr. MALBY. Oh, well, I know nothing about that; I am talking about what the farmer gets.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me on this proposition?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman has given the prices between Detroit and Windsor.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes; I would have quoted the other prices, but the gentleman from New York [Mr. MALBY] said that he had no interest whatever in the prices to the consumer.

Mr. LENROOT. I wish the gentleman would quote the prices of the Tariff Board on cheese between Detroit and Windsor.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I would be glad to, but I have not looked it up. The gentleman can put them in the RECORD.

Mr. LENROOT. I will read them. The wholesale price in Detroit was 15½ cents and at Windsor 10 cents. At Detroit the price was 17½, but at Windsor it was 12½.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. That illustrates the difficulty in depending on these statistics, because any man going from Toronto to Quebec and from Chicago to Bangor to ascertain the price of farm products will find about 25 or 30 different prices of the same commodity at the same time on either side of the line. The Massachusetts cost-of-living statistics directly controvert statistics produced by the Tariff Board.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. The gentleman has been referring to the retail prices, and these statistics refer to the wholesale farmers' prices. They make no contradiction, one of the other.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Now, to resume the argument which I was making against the statement of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Before the gentleman leaves this matter, I would like to ask one question.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Very well.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. The gentleman stated that the manufacture of cheese has passed from the farmer to the factory; that the farmer was no longer interested in the effect of this treaty.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Oh, no; the gentleman from New Jersey is mistaken; I did not make any such broad statement as that.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Since the farmer has found it more profitable to sell the material from which the cheese is made to the factory than to make it himself, is he any the less affected by free trade in cheese than if he used his own materials to make the cheese?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I will say to the gentleman, I did not attempt to make the distinction between the time when he made it himself and between the time when the factories made it, but I said the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS] in making his plea for the cheese farmer probably forgot the industry was now in the hands of the manufacturer of cheese, who makes it in factories.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. How does that affect the farmer less than when he made it himself, since he supplies the factory with the raw material? If free trade in cheese destroys the business of that factory, then what is the farmer to do with his raw material? And if the answer be to make cheese with it, the question is, where will he sell it?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I agree neither with the gentleman's premise nor with his conclusion, and if he had listened to my figures he would not have made that argument, because I stated a few moments ago that the cheese factories of the United States were making 317,000,000 pounds of cheese and exporting 10,000,000 pounds of cheese.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. True, but the simple point I wanted to make——

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I regret to seem discourteous, but I think I have yielded long enough on this subject.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I do not want to take the gentleman's time——

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I beg the gentleman will now allow me to proceed.

Mr. MALBY. Will the gentleman give way for one question?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I decline to yield further on this point. Now, as to the question of potatoes, about which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS] seemed so much concerned, he evidently had not investigated the figures or he would have discovered that in 1910 we imported from Canada $36,000 worth of potatoes, and in the same year we exported to Canada $213,000 worth of potatoes. Now, if we have a surplus of potatoes from this country to export into Canada, how are the potato growers of the United States to be injured by free trade between Canada and the United States in potatoes? The fact of this thing, in my judgment, is that the farmer is being made the cat's-paw in this matter. Gentlemen on either side of the Canadian border line are making use of the farmer to pull their chestnuts out of their fire. The farmer is not going to be injured. The American farmer is not going to be injured when there are 12 American farmers to 1 Canadian farmer. The American farmer is not going to be injured when the productions of our principal crops are in such overwhelming proportions in favor of the American.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. In saying that the American farmer will not be injured by this proposed agreement, if it becomes operative, does the gentleman mean to say that he will not be injured because he will receive as much for his products as he now does?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I firmly believe he will receive fully as much for all his products.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Then the gentleman, I take it, does not subscribe to the doctrine that the passage of this bill will reduce the cost of living.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I will answer the gentleman in two ways. First, by stating what I stated before, that he who deludes himself into the belief that this is going to produce an immediate reduction in the cost of food is very much mistaken. I do not see how any gentleman can successfully maintain that proposition on this floor.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Then the gentleman does not subscribe to that idea, but rather to the other, that this will not reduce the cost of living.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Eventually it will, but now it can not.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Eventually, when it does, will it also lower the cost of the farmer's product?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. It will not, as I stated, and as I will state again, for in my judgment the effect of increasing the sources of food supply will be to prevent the corner of any product on any produce exchange in any city of the United States, and will prevent the middle man from raising the prices to the consumer.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. This bill does not reduce the price to any considerable extent upon what the middle man has, the completed product, dressed beef and flour.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Oh, yes, it does. The gentleman is mistaken. He evidently has not examined the bill. If he will permit me, I will come to that in a few moments.

Mr. Chairman, I would not read these figures, excepting for the fear I have that the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK] may be present in the room. I would like to print them in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent to print these and other tables in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to print certain tables in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, in order thoroughly to understand the extraordinary campaign which has been waged against the reciprocity agreement on both sides of the border line it is necessary to look no further than the thirty-fifth page of the Canadian reciprocity agreement as printed for the use of the Ways and Means Committee.

Read down at the bottom of page 35 and it will appear that the present rate is $1.25 per thousand feet on lumber, which duty is to be removed and that article is to be made free. The whole source of the agitation on the American side of the line comes right from the United States Lumber Trust. It has been urging the farmer into the belief that this reciprocity is going to hurt the farmer, whereas the sole interest that the lumberman has is not for the farmer of the United States, but for himself. A few years ago I was down at Jacksonville, Fla. I was driving along that magnificent drive there, the water front, and I asked the old negro driver who it was who owned a fine house we were passing. "Why," he said, "that is Mr. Jones's house, the lumber king." We drove about another hundred yards and there was another magnificent dwelling on the St. Johns River. I said, "Who owns that house?" "Why," he said, "that is Mr. Smith's, the great lumber king." And then we went a little farther and there was a palace of another lumber king, and you could take all over the United States wherever there is any timber and you will find out that that is the case in each one of those cities. Now, these gentlemen are important, they are powerful, they are rich, and they have come into the arena to do battle with this measure of tariff reform. If they can, they will do it to the death, but so far as the Members of this House are concerned, the Democratic Party is ready to do battle with the Lumber Trust for the rights of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

On the Canadian side of the line the opposition has been just as bitter as it has been on ours, and on their side of the line it proceeds from exactly the same kind of people, the highly protected interests. Now, I have here a few copies from some of the Canadian newspapers showing the frame of mind of the Canadian, whom the farmer of the United States supposes to be chortling in his glee at the prospect of the magnificent advantage that Canada is to derive over the Yankee from this agreement. One man says that "reciprocity is going to split Canada in two." Another speaker says that it is "the worst possible distortion of democracy." Another member of Parliament announces that this is an "outrageous thing." A Canadian newspaper says that Canada is about to "turn aside from her high destiny and become the lumber camp and dumping ground of the proud and prosperous American Republic." Another Canadian newspaper has an editorial which says, "Reciprocity scotched, but not killed. The snake is scotched, but not killed. Congress has expired without passing the reciprocity resolutions, but an extraordinary session has been called for April 4." Now, here is what one of the leading members of Parliament said in the House of Commons there. He said, "Everybody is really laughing at the Canadian commissioners, they being such fools as to go over to the United States and bring back what is in reality a pinchbeck, an imitation treaty," and here he says in the presence of the prime minister:

> Let me tell the minister exactly all about all that. If you look through this treaty you will find that a long, lean, dark——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield the gentleman 30 minutes additional.

Mr. HARRISON of New York (reading)—

> A long, lean, dark, hairy hand has manipulated every part of it. I wonder whose it is?

Mr. MALBY. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague give way for an inquiry?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. With pleasure.

Mr. MALBY. I notice the gentleman is reading a great many extracts from Canadian papers against the so-called treaty. Assuming he has concluded his reading, I wanted to inquire whether he had found any of them who are in favor of it?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Why, I have not any here handy to quote, but I will assure the gentleman that the Canadian protectionist on his side of the line is much more terrified at the prospect of reciprocity even than the American farmer on his side of the line.

I have here a letter which was written by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], in which he addresses his constituents with some very edifying information about the balance of trade in agricultural commodities between the United States and Canada, and in the absence of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], I am going to announce that I shall also print this in the RECORD. Briefly, he says that of horses during the last five fiscal years we sold to Canada $14,000,000 worth and Canada sold to us $2,500,000 worth, being a balance in our favor of $11,600,000 worth. Of cattle, we sold to Canada $1,500,000 worth and Canada sold to us $1,100,000 worth.

The balance in our favor is $384,000. Of meat and dairy products, we sold in Canada $17,000,000 worth and Canada sold to us $904,000 worth, being a difference in our favor of $16,000,000. Of breadstuffs, we sold to Canada $31,500,000 worth and Canada sold to us $6,600,000 worth, being a difference in our favor of $24,916,000.

Now, from these figures the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] argues to his constituents:

Of these items, which are largely produced in Missouri, we sold to Canada $53,030,755 more than Canada sold to us. Upon these articles we had to pay the Canadian tariff. But for this Canadian tariff our balance on these items would have been still larger. Reciprocity would relieve us from that hindrance to our trade. How, then, could reciprocity hurt the Missouri farmer?

Again, here is another newspaper statement of a Canadian reason for opposing reciprocity, and it sounds exactly like the same argument on behalf of the same kind of people on our side of the line. This is Sir Edmund Walker, of Toronto, president of the Canadian Bank of Commerce. He said:

I am opposed to this proposition, because Canada has nothing to gain by it and everything to lose. We are the largest purchasers of goods from the United States, and we sell comparatively little. What can we gain by free trading with this country when we have little of our raw products to sell? Canada consumes 80 per cent of her food products, and this home consumption is growing at a rapid rate. A few years ago we sold to Great Britain $25,000,000 worth of cheese and $7,000,000 worth of butter annually. To-day our cheese exports to Great Britain have fallen off to $17,000,000 and we export no butter. Canada is building up an independent nation, and we have a struggle before us. We do not want to create a market for our agricultural products in their raw state, for we have all the customers we need at our own doors, who pay the farmers prices as high as those of the United States.

Now, I will very cheerfully corroborate his statement about the prices by reading here a table of prices of standard cattle, both in Toronto and Chicago, from 1901 to 1910:

Table of prices, 1901 to 1910.

	Toronto.	Chicago.
May 4, 1901	$4.25	$3.95
May 14, 1902	5.25	5.00
May 13, 1903	4.90	4.06
May 12, 1904	5.20	4.90
May 9, 1905	5.70	5.50
May 10, 1906	5.10	4.00
May 17, 1907	5.12½	4.00
May 15, 1908	5.50	5.00
May 25, 1909	5.75	5.10
May 13, 1910	7.00	6.25

And also a table of prices of various commodities in Toronto and New York, January 2 of this year, as follows:

	Toronto.	New York.
Bran, per ton	$24.00	$24.00
Hay, No. 1	18.00	16.00
Dressed hogs	10.00	11.72½
No. 1 dairy butter, per pound	.30	.22
Eggs, new laid, per dozen	.50	.35
Ducks, per pound	.17	.10
Chickens, per pound	.16	.12½
Turkeys, per pound	.22	.18½
Geese, per pound	.14	.14
Apples, Spy, per barrel	4.50	3.50
Onions, per bushel	1.00	.75
Potatoes, per bag	.90	.73

In view of that statement it is hardly surprising that on March 18 the resolution introduced by Premier Whitney in the Ontario Legislature protesting against the ratification of the agreement for reciprocity with the United States was carried last evening by a vote of 75 to 17.

Again, the Toronto Mail and Empire of February 15, 1911, says:

The markets of Britain and Germany swallow up United States farm produce, and as for the Dominion, it is a pretty good customer for Uncle Sam, even though duties are collectible upon what he has to sell. Last year—that is to say, the year ending on March 31, 1910—we bought from the United States of agricultural products the following:

Animals	$681,000
Grains	268,000
Hay	141,000
Potatoes	179,000
Tomatoes	165,000
Other vegetables	486,000
Fruit	1,120,000
Butter	16,000
Cheese	45,000
Eggs	177,000
Honey	20,000
Clover seed and timothy	748,000
Fruit and other seeds	250,000
Fresh meats	106,000
Bacon and hams	$816,000
Beef, salted	75,000
Pork, barreled in brine	930,000
Meats, dried or smoked	85,000
Meats, salted	50,000
Canned meats	45,000
Lard	1,347,000
Lard compounds	62,000
Canned vegetables	69,000
Wheat flour	156,000
Prepared cereal foods	240,000

If the United States is the paradise for farmers, how does it happen that all these products from the United States come to us despite the adverse duties? While the reciprocity scheme is represented to be a great concession by the United States Government to the Canadian farmers, for whom that Government has suddenly developed an affection, the truth is that it is really a plan for the improvement of the condition of the United States farmers, and for the thwarting of the British preference for Canada which the Unionists in Britain are advocating. The United States farmer will get under reciprocity a larger share of the Canadian fruit market, the Canadian meat market, and the Canadian market for early vegetables. He will also be assured of the continuation of free trade in Britain for his surplus. But the Canadian farmer can not derive a corresponding advantage from the bargain. Everything we can produce is also produced in the States, and in quantities that are far in excess of the consumption.

Mr. KENDALL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes, sir.

Mr. KENDALL. Is it the tendency of the gentleman's argument to establish that agricultural products are really cheaper in America than they are in Canada?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. In many cases they are. There is no general rule which can be observed.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] submitted some figures upon the price of hay in the United States and the price of hay in Canada, and he evidently had not examined the report of the Tariff Board on this subject, because instead of being able to tell me that my figures on hay were isolated examples, he would find that all along the line and in almost every instance hay is more expensive in the Canadian market than it is in the markets of the United States. If he will go further and examine this report, and the report of the Massachusetts commission to investigate the cost of living, he will find that beans, peas, beets, and onions, as well as other vegetables, are uniformly or almost uniformly, higher in the Canadian markets than they are in the markets of the United States. I will submit to the Committee, and print in the RECORD, the prices of eggs, which along the Canadian border line are more expensive in Canada than they are in the United States, causing a natural export from our country to Canada of 750,000 dozen last year, while we imported from Canada only 39,000 dozen:

Wholesale prices January, 1911, in Buffalo, 36 cents a dozen; Toronto, 40 cents a dozen; retail prices, Buffalo, 36 cents a dozen; Toronto, 50 cents a dozen. In Bangor, Eastport, and Calais, Me., wholesale prices, 26–30 cents a dozen; in St. Stephens, New Brunswick, 33 cents. In Manchester, N. H., wholesale, 27 cents; retail, 30 cents. In Sherbrooke, Quebec, wholesale, 35 cents; retail, 35 cents. In Ogdensburg, N. Y., wholesale, 30 cents; retail, 35 cents. In Prescott, Canada, wholesale, 32 cents; retail, 36 cents. In Burlington, Vt., wholesale, 27 cents; retail, 30 cents. In Montreal, wholesale, 35 cents; retail, 40 cents.

Now, there is one great exception to my belief that the cost of food products will not be immediately lowered by the passage of this act, and I refer to the question of fish.

Undoubtedly the admission of fish free from Canada will be a great boon to the eastern cities along the Atlantic seaboard. At the present time we import $13,800,000 worth of fish altogether, of which 35 per cent comes from Canada. Now Canada exported $16,000,000 worth of fish last year, and I hope and believe a considerable proportion of the Canadian export of fish will henceforth come to the people of the cities on the Atlantic seaboard, where the high prices of meat have made it all the more desirable for the people of those cities to have cheaper fish.

The United States Bureau of Fisheries has estimated that Canada can supply us, if given a chance, with twice as great a supply of cod, haddock, and hake as she does now, and with an immensely increased supply of halibut, mackerel, salmon, and smelts. According to their estimates, Canada could supply us with 20,000,000 pounds fresh cod, 10,000,000 to 15,000,000 pounds fresh haddock, 5,000,000 pounds fresh hake, and 12,000,000 pounds of fresh halibut.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would like to know where the gentleman gets his figures on the fish products.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Those were the figures given out by the United States Bureau of Fisheries about three weeks ago.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I simply wish to say that in this book, which is put out for our credence on reciprocity, it is shown that Canada shipped into the United States, all told, fish to the value of $73,000,000, as against less than $4,000,000 worth shipped into Canada by the United States.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The gentleman is talking about salted fish. I was not talking about salted fish. I was talking about fresh fish entirely.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was talking about all kinds of fish.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Now, to take up one other point in this argument; the farmers of the United States have been made to believe that while their products have gone on the free list the products of manufacturers have been left at the former high rates. In other words, the farmers have been made to believe that they are not getting a square deal, and in that belief they are encouraged to assert that the negotiators of this treaty have betrayed the farmer for the sake of getting free food from Canada; that they put his products on the free list and keep high taxes upon manufactured articles. Now, the most brief and cursory examination of the provisions of this agreement will show that manufactured articles have been immensely reduced in duties, not all along the line, but in many articles in which the farmer himself is interested. I will print these in the RECORD instead of detaining the committee at this time by reading them:

RECIPROCITY CONTAINS REDUCTIONS ON MANUFACTURED GOODS.

Many agricultural implements, 45 per cent to 20 per cent: Hay loaders, potato diggers, fodder or feed cutters, grain crushers, fanning mills, hay tedders, farm or field rollers, manure spreaders, windmills, parts for repair.

Portable engines and traction engines, 30 per cent to 20 per cent.

Pocketknives, scissors, shears, and cutlery, 40–60 per cent to 27½ per cent.

Clocks, watches, etc., 40 per cent to 27½ per cent.

Farm wagons, 35 per cent to 22½ per cent.

Also, flour from 25 per cent to 50 cents per barrel. Canned vegetables, 40 per cent to 1½ cents a pound. Oatmeal, 1 cent per pound to 50 cents per 100 pounds. Prepared cereal foods, 20 per cent to 17½ per cent. Mutton, lamb, and fresh meats, 1½ cents per pound to 1½ cents per pound. Bacon and hams, 4 cents per pound to 1½ cents per pound.

Also, carbon electrodes, 30 per cent to free. Brass in bars and rods, 45 per cent to free. Cream separators, 45 per cent to free. Tinplates, 1.2 cents per pound to free. Crucible cast-steel wire, 35 per cent to free. Galvanized iron and steel wire, 1.2 cents per pound to free. Type-casting and typesetting machines, 30 per cent to free. Barbed fencing wire, ¾ cent per pound to free. Rolled round wire rods, 0.6 cent per pound to free.

But it is a fair question to ask why there were not more manufactured articles either reduced in duty or put on the free list. The farmer thinks that the people who negotiated this treaty did it because they meant to make a drive at him, and as one of those who is in favor of the treaty, I feel some concern that he should entertain such a supposition. I will therefore read, for the benefit of the committee, a brief explanation made by the Canadian premier, Sir Wilfred Laurier, as to exactly why the treaty was drawn up in the shape it is now in. Speaking in the Canadian House of Commons on March 7, 1911, he said:

This agreement is concerned chiefly with natural products. There are no manufactured products dealt with in it, except agricultural implements. In negotiating this agreement we have adhered strictly to the terms of the resolution which was adopted at the Liberal convention of 1893, in which the Liberal Party declared for a treaty of reciprocity in natural products and a carefully considered list of manufactured products. Why did we put this restriction in our resolution? Why did we state in so many words that the reciprocity which we would negotiate, if it ever became our lot to do so, would be general for natural products, and would be confined to a carefully prepared list of manufactured products? Because, sir, there is a vast difference between reciprocity in natural products and reciprocity in manufactured goods. This is the reason we have acted with this prudence. I do not know who was present at the conference which took place between our two friends besides me and Mr. Knox; but it is not a great effort of imagination to suppose that the Americans were far more concerned about obtaining reciprocity in manufactured products than in natural products; but our negotiators would not consent to any reciprocity in manufactured products, but insisted on limiting the agreement simply to such manufactured products as agricultural implements.

So that gentlemen can plainly see, from the statement of the Canadian premier himself, that the Americans were not trying to keep all manufactured products on the dutiable list; that it was the Canadians themselves who were doing that; that they were unwilling to have our manufactured products come into Canada at greatly reduced rates.

Now, so far as Democrats are able to correct this inequality, we propose to do so by a bill which will come treading fast upon the heels of this one, for the moment that the reciprocity agreement has passed the House the Democrats will offer the House a bill placing upon the free list a great many manufactured products which the plain people and the farmer folks of the United States have to purchase. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But the farmers should understand that the treaty drawn in the form in which it is, which is substantially the form of the Democratic reciprocity treaty of 1854, was not drawn with any dark or cunning design on the part of privileged interests in this country pulling the strings behind the scenes, but was the result of the refusal of the Canadians themselves to let more of our manufactured products come into their country.

But, as the gentleman from North Carolina well said the other day, it is impossible to measure the benefits of this treaty by any figures of dollars and cents. There is a bigger question here than any question as to whether a peck of onions costs more in Canada or in the United States. It is a question of principle that goes to the very roots of our economic policy. It is a principle which, I am glad to say, the Democratic Party is standing almost solidly behind. I believe it is the entrance to a new era of economic prosperity. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], in boasting about the effects of his protective system, entirely overlooked the panic of 1907–1909. He had a singularly agile memory when he transported us back to the days of 1894–1896 and entirely neglected to call our attention to the Roosevelt panic, under high protection, which struck hardest of all in the highly protected district of Pittsburg, where most men were thrown out of employment. Overlooking that panic, the gentleman from Michigan believes that the protective system has built up the prosperity of the United States. Gentlemen on this side of the Chamber believe that our prosperity has gone forward by leaps and bounds in spite of that prohibitive protection, and they believe that this reciprocity agreement will produce the greatest prosperity that this country has ever known. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McMORRAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. I will ask the gentleman not to interrupt me. I am about to conclude. I believe our economic prosperity will advance by the greatest strides this country has ever seen as soon as this treaty with Canada goes into effect, and that it will lead inevitably and with unerring aim to absolute free trade between the Dominion of Canada and the United States. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the immediate effect upon our business affairs of striking down these unnatural barriers between our sister country and ourselves will be magical. By the treaty of 1854 half of the Canadian carrying trade was immediately transferred, the very next year, into the hands of the United States, and as soon as this treaty goes into effect every line of industry and every occupation in the United States will at once reap the benefit of a sound, healthy, and sane economic administration of affairs between ourselves and the Dominion of Canada. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I yield back the balance of my time and ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SHERLEY). Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, how much time did the gentleman from New York consume?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York consumed 47 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS].

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I spoke on the subject of Canadian reciprocity last February and I now wish to urge again its consideration.

This is the identical measure which at the last session of Congress passed this House by an overwhelming majority. The opposition in the Senate prevented its consideration in that body and now the House is preparing to again pass the measure, and by their action and the renewed urgency of our President force the consideration of the reciprocity bill on the Senate.

Since the days of the Revolution the subject of closer commercial relations with Canada, a country situated on our same continent and populated by people of similar tastes and standards, has ever been before our people, but at no time has the popular demand for an extension of our trade relations with our neighbor on the north been so universal as it is to-day.

With the ever-increasing cost of living and the hindrance of our industries by a tariff policy which raises the cost of production of American goods, the manufactories of our country are demanding wider markets and the people of our cities are demanding cheaper goods. Our industries, unequaled in power and production by any in the world, can no longer demand the entire surrender to them of the American market, and a reduction of the price of necessities can be accomplished only by an extension and widening of our commercial relations. The first step to check the increasing cost of living is offered by reciprocity with Canada. Further steps will be taken as rapidly as possible, for the Democratic Party, elected on pledges for a lower tariff, proposes to keep those pledges by revising the tariff in the consumer's interest. Mr. Chairman, had the Nation listened with more patience to those who a century ago urged closer commercial relations with the Provinces to our north, both countries would have developed along natural lines of commerce, and to-day we would not hear the complaints of that small proportion of our population who believe that this agreement will prove injurious to them. We have also, Mr. Chairman, the illustration before us of the workings of a previous treaty of a similar nature with our neighbor.

THE ELGIN TREATY, 1854–1866.

Although the reciprocity sentiment has always been felt in the councils of this Nation, but one really comprehensive reciprocity agreement with Canada has become a law. This agreement—the Elgin treaty—was in force from 1854 to 1866. It dealt with three subjects—navigation of the St. Lawrence, trade relations, and the fisheries question. Of these the subject of trade relations is alone germane to the present discussion. The question of the fisheries, recently settled by The Hague, now interests us only in its commercial aspect, and the navigation question is a thing of the past.

The sentiment toward establishing a reciprocity agreement with Canada was very strong in the late forties. In 1848 such an agreement passed the House, but went no further and failed to become a law, because of complications as to the St. Lawrence which were of such a nature that they could never have been unraveled by legislative action alone.

In 1850 another bill to establish Canadian reciprocity passed the House, but was again halted by the complexities and doubts as to the attitude of Canada, and this attempt also failed.

In 1853, therefore, Congress passed a resolution authorizing the President to arrange reciprocity by means of a treaty, and under this authorization the treaty was drawn and was later passed by the House and ratified by the Senate. The Elgin treaty thus enacted provided a much more complete free list than that here presented. It provided for free interchange of natural products from farm and sea, forest and mine. The free list contained wood, cotton, coal, wool, raw tobacco, meats, and manufactured lumber. This extensive free list met with almost universal approval, and although it put on the free list many more products of the farm than are included in the list before us now, yet it was not considered to have injured the agricultural interests. No complaint was heard from the American farmers as to the workings of the Canadian agreement, and, in fact, their only criticism was that more products were not placed on the free list.

The feeling against the Elgin treaty, which resulted in its repeal in 1866, can not be attributed to its economic failure, and a study of its effect on our commercial relations with Canada is the strongest argument in support of the Canadian reciprocity agreement of to-day.

SUCCESS OF ELGIN TREATY.

In answer to a resolution of the House the Secretary of the Treasury communicated to the House of Representatives February 21, 1864, a letter which gave tables which furnish us with information as to the working of this treaty. The total imports into Canada from the United States in 1850 are shown by this table to be $6,594,860, on which we paid in duties the sum of $1,069,814. The exports from the United States into Canada were at this time gradually increasing each year, though at a very slow rate; but in 1855, the year after the ratification of the treaty, our exports to Canada alone amounted to $20,828,676, and increased yearly until in 1862 they amounted to $25,173,157. So under the operation of this treaty the exports from the United States to Canada increased from $6,000,000 to $25,000,000 annually, more than quadrupled.

At the same time the value of the free goods which we sent into Canada from the United States increased from $791,128 in 1850 until they reached $19,444,374 in 1862, the last year in which there was return, or from considerably less than one million up to nearly twenty millions.

It can not be claimed that the Canadian duties were unfairly raised, because during all this time the Canadian rate of import duty, which in 1850 was 18.43 per cent, increased in 1861 to 19 per cent, which was only a small fraction larger than when the treaty was commenced. To Canada and its Provinces the total exports from the United States increased to $28,629,110 in 1863 and the imports from Canada and the Provinces from $490,704 to $19,299,995. The total trade between the United States and Canada increased from $24,182,103 in 1854 to $40,908,887 in 1862, and shows the marked success of the treaty. The figures for the last few years of the treaty are misleading, because the war between the States created an unnatural demand for Canadian goods. The minority in their report protest against the measure because "it renews a trade agreement with Canada similar to one which heretofore existed, from 1854 to 1866, and the operation of which proved disastrous to the United States." The effect of that treaty is one of the strongest reasons for the enactment of this present measure, and the figures I have just given indicate that commercially the previous treaty was successful, and we are confident this treaty will prove so as well. All the conditions which made that treaty successful exist to-day in greater force. The fact that the total trade with Canada almost doubled in less than 10 years may show to those opposed to the measure that it was a failure, but I am confident that the people of this country will regard such a fact as the best evidence of its success.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH CANADA.

Since 1892 the United States has sent each year to Canada an amount constantly increasing in excess of our imports from the north, until in the fiscal year of 1910 our Canadian exports were more than double our imports—$206,611,517 to $96,357,998.

WHERE CANADA TRADES TO-DAY.

In proportion to her population Canada is the best market for our products, and her purchases from this country of $223,521,800 are over twice what she purchased from Great Britain and compose half of the entire imports of the Dominion. Her exports to us amount to $104,199,675 as against exports of $139,482,945 which she sends to England. Hence, while supplying half her imports, we only purchase from her 37.3 per cent of her exports. Our exports to the German Empire are but $258,000,000, or but little in excess of those to Canada. Without the item of cotton our exports to Germany amount to $120,000,000. Enormous as is this trade with Canada, with the artificial barriers of the tariff removed it would undoubtedly, if we may judge by our previous experience with Canadian reciprocity, greatly increase our commercial relations with the Dominion. Since the unwise termination of reciprocity in 1866 Canada's exports to England have increased 527 per cent, but her exports to this country only 62 per cent. Here at a glance is the result of high protection—an invisible, unnatural, political border line made nearly nine times as obstructive as 2,000 miles of salt water.

THE EFFECT OF OTHER RECIPROCITY TREATIES.

We have seen that the effect of the previous reciprocity treaty was to immensely enlarge the business and commerce between the United States and Canada. That such enlargement was to the mutual profit of the people of both countries no one can deny. Commercially and politically it served a most important purpose. In considering the effect which this proposed treaty with Canada may have, it will be particularly important to see the effect on our trade relations which other reciprocity treaties which are at present in existence have produced.

Trade with the Philippine Islands shows tremendous growth under the stimulus of the reciprocity agreement, as is shown by the following tables:

Exports from United States to Philippine Islands, 1909	$11,189,441
Imports from Philippine Islands	9,433,986
Total trade for year 1909, before free trade	20,623,427
Exports from United States to Philippine Islands, 1910	16,832,645
Imports from Philippine Islands to United States	17,317,897
Total trade for year 1910, after free trade	34,150,542

An increase of 70 per cent during a single year.

Porto Rico, with which we have free trade, shows by its imports and exports an equally strong argument for reciprocity:

Exports from United States to Porto Rico, 1898	$1,505,946
Imports from Porto Rico to United States, same year	2,414,356
Total trade for year ending June 30, 1898	3,920,302
Shipments of merchandise from United States to Porto Rico, 1910	27,097,654
Imports from Porto Rico to United States	32,095,897
Total trade for year 1910	59,193,551

Cuba, with which we have a reciprocity agreement, shows the advantages of this trade, as follows:

Imports from Cuba to United States, 1903	$62,942,790
Exports from United States to Cuba, 1903	21,761,638
Total trade for 1903, before treaty	84,704,428
Imports from Cuba to United States, 1910	122,528,037
Exports from United States to Cuba, 1910	52,858,758
	175,386,795

The arrangements above show absolutely that in all three instances both countries have profited immensely by their trade, and can anyone doubt that in obtaining for the people of the United States the food products from these islands we have made a distinct advance in retarding the ever-increasing cost of living? To the people of these islands themselves we have given the power to purchase our manufactured articles, which purchases have stimulated our manufactures and increased the demand for labor in this country.

COST OF LIVING.

The increased cost of living is one of the principal problems faced by the people of to-day. The purchasing power of the workingman's wages has grown constantly less. The United States Senate has made an investigation of the cost of living. Many States have done the same thing, and it is a problem which we are making every effort to solve. My own State of Massachusetts appointed a commission on this subject, and I quote from its report (Mass. House, 1910, Doc. 1750, p. 384):

But the tariff was never meant to apply seriously to the food of the people, save for the development of such industries as the growing of fruit in Florida or beets for sugar in the West. From the first it was designed to create and preserve manufacturing industries. The odium of the corn laws need but be suggested to show how obnoxious would be a serious tax on food. If we have reached the point where it is of real importance to us to have the product of the farms of the North, as well as that of the farms of the West, no tariff hindrance can be endured.

As this country approaches the point where it will cease to export many of its food products, the tariff on food will force up the prices, and, in addition, will enable speculators, by cornering the market on food products, to engage in the worst form of speculations on the daily demands of the necessaries of the people.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETERS. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. I take it from the gentleman's argument that his belief is that this agreement will tend to reduce the cost of food.

Mr. PETERS. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Does the gentleman believe also that it will reduce the price of materials from which food is made, which will be received by the farmer?

Mr. PETERS. I will say, if the gentleman will allow me, that the consumption of food in this country is increasing faster than its production and that we are closely reaching the point where we will cease to produce in America sufficient food products for the American consumption. When that point is reached, then I believe that we must have some food imported from other countries. I do not think to-day in many food products they will be affected one way or the other by the passage of this agreement.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Then, if the food products are not affected, I suppose the prices of the products to the consumer will not be affected by this bill?

Mr. PETERS. I think the food prices to the consumer will be somewhat affected, because it will allow an interchange of food products from points in Canada to the United States where they can be exchanged with a less cost of transportation and that the expense of the middle man in placing the food in the hands of the consumer will be reduced; and I do think that in certain articles of food there will be a reduction, and a material one in certain cities. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. To what commodities does the gentleman refer, may I inquire for information?

Mr. PETERS. I am coming to it, and I have tables to show the difference in prices of food between American cities and those in Canada.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Can we have from the gentleman what particular food commodities he claims will be reduced in price in cities as a result of this legislation?

Mr. PETERS. I was about to present the statistics on this when the gentleman interrupted me. In proof of the general proposition that the consumption of food products in this country is outstripping the production of the country I want to quote to the House certain statistics of imports of food for the last few years. I invite the consideration of the House to some facts in the conclusion of the Cost of Living Report I referred to, on page 530, and ask them to bear in mind that this food report was made by a commission the majority of whose members are believers in a protective tariff. The report says:

It is not probable that the removal of the duty on farm products would diminish by a penny the wage rate of farm laborers anywhere in the United States. That rate is determined by the competition of the mill and the attractiveness of the city. * * *

It is not our belief that removal of the tariff on the staple articles of food would speedily and greatly reduce the cost of living. The same causes are making food high in all the civilized world, and the difference between wholesale prices is not enough to warrant the expectation that a policy of what, for brevity's sake, would doubtless be called "free food" could change international transactions greatly and at once. Its importance comes from the fact that we are soon going to buy a material part of our food outside our own limits. It would further have the very beneficial consequence of removing what chance may now exist to "corner" food products—a chance that puts the public at the mercy of the speculator and the trust. To some extent, also, it would lessen our dependence on the seasons and the weather. Bad harvests rarely occur over all the world.

We submit, therefore, that it is a wise economic policy to give the people free access to those articles of food that call for the bulk of the expenditure of the masses. For purposes of revenue, it may be wise to tax somewhat the comforts, and the heaviest duties should be levied on the luxuries, but the food necessities of life should be "free."

Now turn to statistics in support of the above statements. First consider wheat.

WHEAT.

Wheat is the most important product of the Dominion of Canada, of which product Canada exported 57,000,000 bushels, out of a total crop of 166,744,000. This bill removes the duty of 25 cents a bushel on wheat. At the present we export 144,000,000 bushels of wheat, but our amount is constantly diminishing, while that of Canada is rapidly increasing, and at no distant day our exportations from this country will probably cease. The price of wheat is largely determined, not by local conditions, but by the markets of the world in Liverpool, where the wheat grown in Russia, Asia, Canada, and the United States compete.

In 1910 the United States exported into Canada $55,139, or 54,964 bushels, and there was imported from Canada $135,441, or 152,441 bushels.

THE AMERICAN FARMER.

If the American farmer could stand the whole Canadian output in the fifties, surely he can stand the portion that would be diverted from England by the operation of the agreement now before us, an agreement not nearly so comprehensive as that of 1854.

CONSUMPTION IS INCREASING FASTER THAN PRODUCTION.

In proof of the proposition that consumption is increasing faster than production let me first quote from the Report on the Cost of Living (p. 265) of the Massachusetts commission:

The home demand for the products of the soil is outstripping the home supply.

Imports for consumption.	1899	1909
Breadstuffs	$940,366	$5,190,354
Meat and dairy products	1,950,835	6,503,775
Vegetables	2,170,959	8,029,748
Wood, and manufactures of wood	8,241,250	30,642,780

Not only do we import more for consumption—we export less of food products and produce, in the main, less per capita from year to year. In proof of this statement, let us consider a few statistics. First in regard to wheat:

	Per cent.
Since 1880 population of the United States has increased	80
Since 1880 production of wheat in United States increased but	50
For the decade ending 1890 United States exported of its wheat (average)	27
For the decade ending 1900 United States exported of its wheat	25
For the last 6 years United States exported of its wheat	17
For the year 1909 United States exported of its wheat	12
	Bushels.
In 1880 United States produced per capita	9.9
In 1909 United States produced per capita but	8.3

Contrast this rate with that of Canada:

In 1909 Canada produced per capita	23.7

Nor has the United States cut down its rate of consumption:

	Bushels.
In 1900 per capita consumption of United States	4.74
In 1909 per capita consumption of United States	6.22

The report of the Massachusetts commission, page 367, draws the obvious conclusion:

Eliminating the factor of the variations of crop, it looks as if we were lessening our exports by about 2 per cent a year, so that it is not at all impossible that we shall be in the world's market for wheat in the course of a dozen years. Of course when we begin buying wheat it will be from Canada.

Other examples beside wheat.

Over this same period population has increased 25 per cent, which means that in 1900 there were 5 bushels of these grains per capita, now but 4 bushels. Barley alone of the great cereal crops has kept pace with growing population.

Two other interesting examples of actual and comparative decline in production.

The Massachusetts commission, in its report on the cost of living (p. 529), mentions the drain of the population from the land as one of the main factors in restricting supply and enhancing the cost of commodities.

The percentage of increase of our urban to our suburban population shows also the fact that we are having fewer and fewer people producing the products and we are having more and more people desiring to consume them in our cities. With demand constantly outstripping supply, it will not be long before we cease exporting food products altogether. The ever-increasing growth of our cities is hastening that end.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks this is a desirable condition, and if he thinks that subjecting the farmers' products to the competition of Canada will tend to decrease it?

Mr. PETERS. I fail to see what effect the competition of the Canadians would have on either increasing or decreasing the tendency toward the concentration of the population in our cities. I believe that that is caused by other circumstances which are entirely beyond and outside of those to be affected by the agreement which is before us.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. PETERS. Certainly.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. Does the gentleman think that this relative rapid increase of population in the cities is due to the fact that we have not the agricultural land on which to raise the products, or does he think that the inducements of manufactures and other industries are so large and so much greater that the farmers are turning to them? It must be one way or the other.

Mr. PETERS. Why, as I replied before, the general social conditions, the general circumstances of life in the country, the general opportunities that are offered in the cities all tend to affect it. It is too large a question, if the gentleman will excuse me, for me to take up and make a reply to in the few remaining minutes which I have granted to me at the present time.

Mr. YOUNG of Michigan. It seems to me it is a most important question at this point.

Mr. PETERS. To the same report I will refer you in regard to this effect of the concentration of population in our cities.

OBJECTION OF THE MINORITY TO RECIPROCITY.

It appears from the views of the minority set forth in the report (H. Rept. 2150), and from the speech made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] on February 15, that those opposed to reciprocity with Canada have three main objections to the proposed treaty.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], who signs the report, calls attention to the objections to this agreement and sums them up in three heads. The first objection is that we should vote against this agreement because it is un-Republican. Gentlemen, I am afraid the Members of this body will to-day place the welfare of the American people above the force which the gentleman from Pennsylvania gives to that argument. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The second point: It is class legislation. It discriminates against the farmer. In Mr. DALZELL's words:

> His corn, his wheat, his potatoes, his hay, his oats, his live stock are all put on the free list. His reaper, his harrow, his plow, his farm implements are all taxed.

In the first place, I have just shown you that the production of all our great cereal crops, except barley, is not increasing at a rate anything like population.

Secondly, farming implements, together with a number of other things, are going to be put on a free list which is already reported by the Ways and Means Committee to the House, against the objection of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but there is the danger, of course, that when this matter comes up for discussion the minority will find it convenient to use farm implements to support a different argument, namely, that to put these articles on the free list would be "class discrimination of the most obnoxious character"—it would give the farmer an unfair advantage over the protected manufacturer. It is in this manner that the protectionists hold themselves out as the savior of all classes.

The third point made by the minority: It involves a trade agreement with Canada similar to the one that existed from 1854 to 1866, and the operation of which proved disastrous to the United States.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania in his speech in the House on February 15, 1911, makes much of the point that this is the reciprocity agreement of 1854 over again, with comparatively little change. He then attempts to establish the fact that the 1854 treaty was disastrous to the United States, and he then concludes that the proposed treaty will be accompanied with the same bad results as that of 1854.

In the opening sentence of his speech Mr. DALZELL declared it was not his intention to go into details, nor would I attempt to estimate exactly what will be the actual amount of trade in each or any articles upon the passage of this reciprocity treaty, but like Mr. DALZELL I will attempt to draw some conclusions from our previous experience with reciprocity. I have already given you some statistics which pointed out the growth of trade between Canada and the United States. Mr. DALZELL in his speech of February 15 admits this growth of trade between the two countries, but greatly laments the effect it had on the balance of trade and, with Mr. Blaine as his authority, states that in the last year and three-quarters of its (the treaty's) life the balance of trade was against us in the sum of over twenty-eight millions.

The last year and three-quarters of this treaty were coincident with the closing years of the war between the States, a period when we were producing an abnormally small amount both on the farm and in the shop. We had to buy abroad, and I would ask if it was not a matter of good fortune rather than otherwise that we had a source so near at hand—where could we have obtained food and other supplies more quickly or cheaply?

To-day the balance of trade is not the "bugbear" it was in the middle of the last century; but if a point is to be made of it in judging the success of the 1854 reciprocity treaty, would it not be more to the point to take the statistics of trade other than those which show the trade of this country with Canada when we were in the most unnatural condition imaginable?

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman does not contend that those figures are not correct, does he?

Mr. PETERS. I do not, but I do contend that the inference should be drawn only from the time the Elgin treaty started, in 1854, up to the time the abnormal conditions began to affect our trade with Canada, in 1862 and 1863. And the figures of that time will show such a condition that the gentleman himself will come to a very different conclusion from that which he seeks to present to this House in his argument in February last.

Now, on page 117 of Extracts from Congressional Debates on the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, House Document 1350, you will find a table showing our imports to and exports from Canada from 1854 to 1862, and inasmuch as the gentleman asked me a question, I will ask him if he considers these figures show the Elgin treaty to be a failure?

Total exports to Canada	$15,533,101	$25,173,157
Total imports from Canada	8,649,002	15,063,703
Balance in favor of the United States	6,884,099	10,109,454

A gain of over $3,000,000, or of 50 per cent, in our excess export balance.

The only year down to 1862 in which we did not have a favorable balance of trade with Canada was in 1860, when Canada exported more than she imported by the insignificant sum of $250,000—and it will be recalled that 1860 was a year of commercial and financial instability in the United States.

As late as May 24, 1864, Mr. Sweat said in the House:

By a report of the Secretary of the Treasury recently made it appears that our exports to the British Provinces were $26,445,683 more than the amount imported from them by the United States.

He also states that with all the defects of the present treaty the balance of trade for the last 10 years has been in favor of the United States.

It would seem, then, that Mr. DALZELL's argument against the success of the treaty of 1854 was unfortunately based on figures that were really not representative. It therefore follows that that gentleman's gloomy predictions, which are based entirely upon results which seem to be misleading, can have little weight in the consideration of what will result from the proposed treaty.

Mr. DALZELL frankly says that we "have everything coming our way"—that is to say, the balance of trade with Canada to-day is decidedly in our favor; in fact, it is abnormally in our favor. Judged from the statistics given by Mr. DALZELL, it would seem that we would lose this balance. I have shown you that such a conclusion is unwarranted. Also, Mr. DALZELL seems to entirely overlook the fact that if Canada can buy our goods to-day in great quantity she would be able to do so to a much larger extent if she could pay for them with her products instead of with gold.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, may I have a moment more?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, as this seems to me an opportune moment, and as I have some tables which I wish to present to the House, I will ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to be allowed to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. PETERS. I am evidently mistaken as to the opportunity. [Laughter.]

Mr. KENDALL. The gentleman should not have asked for unanimous consent in so loud a voice. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman want to insert some figures in the RECORD?

Mr. PETERS. Yes; tables of figures covering prices.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. PETERS. I do.

Mr. MANN. I wish to inquire, without taking it out of the gentleman's time, whether the objection of the gentleman from Florida goes to the extension of remarks, or to the ordinary insertion of figures and tables, such as are not ordinarily included in a speech as it is delivered on the floor, and whether there is any objection to the request that that privilege be granted to the gentleman?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do not hear the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I ask whether the objection of the gentleman from Florida to the extension of remarks goes simply to the extension of remarks, or to the right to insert tables of figures and papers that are correlated with the argument?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I would like to state, for the benefit of the committee and to answer the gentleman from Illinois, that I do not care. My object is to try to force, if it can be done, an amendment to the rules—such an amendment as I introduced this morning—to stop this indiscriminate printing of prepared speeches in the RECORD that were never delivered.

I do not intend to object, and I want to put the committee upon notice now that I do not intend to object to the request of any gentleman during this tariff debate, to print in the RECORD statistical information, but I do intend to object whenever I am here—I can not be here every minute—to the extension of remarks by which some gentlemen write out long-winded arguments that were never delivered, because I regard that practice as a fraud upon the public and an unnecessary tax upon the Treasury. That is my position.

Mr. MANN. In the main I fully agree with the gentleman, and I thought the gentleman would not wish to object to inserting tables of figures, and such things.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do not, and shall not object to that during this debate.

Mr. PETERS. Then, I will submit the request again, that I may print in the RECORD, in connection with my speech, certain tables which are taken from the report that I hold in my hand, and which are pertinent to the subject before the House at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to include with his remarks certain statistical reports just referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. PETERS. And the words of explanation which naturally precede them.

Mr. MANN. Oh, certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PETERS. Gentlemen, we are not claiming that this reciprocity agreement is going to revolutionize the cost of living, but I have tried to show you here to-day, and the import and export figures do show conclusively, that, in the first place, the Elgin treaty, to which this is similar, was financially and commercially a success for this country. Trade increased under it to a tremendous extent. I have shown here, also, that the consumption of agricultural products is increasing in America far beyond the increase in their production. It is admitted that the cost of living is going to be an ever-quickening problem that must be faced, that all the people of our country are facing. We do not come before the people to favor one class of consumers as against another, and you will have the best of evidence before this session is over that the Democratic Party, which has been placed in control of this House, proposes to carry out to the people of the country to the letter the pledges that it made before election. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I believe that we are getting dangerously near the point where the duty on food products will raise the price or render easy a corner in the market. To carry out this agreement this body will act in accordance with an overwhelming public sentiment, and will show that it is actually what it is in name—the House of Representatives of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HARDWICK having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

RECIPROCITY WITH CANADA.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD with my remarks the statistical tables to which I referred in the course of those remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HARRISON] asks unanimous consent to print with his remarks certain statistical tables. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DALZELL. How much time did the last gentleman consume?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has used 4 hours and 12 minutes in all, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] 3 hours and 37 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to state that I will yield five hours to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], to be consumed on that side by gentlemen favoring the bill. I will arrange with him as to the time when that shall come in. I will say that we should like to have the debate run this evening until 6 o'clock.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield one hour to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, on Saturday last this debate was opened by one of the greatest orators and perhaps the readiest debater in this House—my friend the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. In his opening remarks he congratulated the Democratic majority upon the auspicious beginning which they had made in the carrying out of their platform promises. He did well so to congratulate them, for that was the first time within the memory of any man within the sound of my voice when anyone could congratulate the Democratic Party upon carrying out any promise.

He referred to two measures which have already passed this House: First, the resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution for the election of Senators by a direct vote, and I join with him in congratulating the Democratic majority upon the passage of that resolution. [Applause.] I congratulate this side of the House upon the fact that that resolution received almost the unanimous support of the Members on this side of the Chamber. The second measure that he referred to was the measure that passed this House last Friday with reference to publicity of campaign contributions, and the gentleman said that that, too, was a fulfillment of the pledge of the Democratic Party in that regard.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to read the promise of the Democratic Party made in its national convention in 1908 with reference to campaign contributions, and consider for a moment how near that bill complies with the promise of his party. That plank reads as follows:

We pledge the Democratic Party to the enactment of a law preventing any corporation contributing to a campaign fund.

Was there any line in that bill on prohibiting corporations from contributing to campaign funds? No; but the Democratic Party is not chargeable with any neglect for that reason, because at the time this platform was written there had been written into the statute books of the United States, 12 months before by the Republican Party, a law prohibiting corporations from contributing to campaign funds. [Applause on the Republican side.] And therefore the Democratic majority should be acquitted from any charge of violation of their platform in that regard.

As I listened to the gentleman from North Carolina Saturday, listened to the wealth of misinformation that flowed from his lips—not intentionally misleading, of course, because the gentleman would not do that—but as I listened to him and his carelessness, not to say recklessness of statement, I wondered if the gentleman from North Carolina, perhaps, had not written this plank in the Democratic platform pledging the Democratic Party to the enactment of a law that had already been enacted by the Republican Party. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Perhaps the gentleman from North Carolina had not had the time for a serious study of the question which he discussed Saturday, and perhaps he may be excused for the same reason for writing, if he did write, this promise into the platform of his party.

But that is not all. The pledge goes further:

We demand the enactment of a law preventing any corporation contributing to campaign funds and any individual from contributing an amount above a reasonable minimum.

Mr. Chairman, was there anything of that kind in the bill which passed this House last Friday? Was that pledge of the platform carried out?

But there is more of this:

And providing for the publication before election of all such contributions above a reasonable minimum.

Was there anything in the bill that passed this House last Friday carrying out that pledge of the Democratic Party? There was such an amendment offered to that bill upon this side of the House, and you remember that it was adopted and placed in the bill through the courage and independence of a sufficient number of Democrats voting with the minority upon this side to place it there. And then we remember how the party lash flew across that side of the Chamber, and inside of 15 minutes, without any intervening debate or any discussion, a sufficient number of Democrats reversed themselves to defeat that amendment. Upon that amendment, offered by this side of the House, squarely carrying out the pledge of your own party, 165 of the Democrats upon that side of the Chamber voted "no."

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman does not mean to be understood to say that there was not a publicity plank in the law that we passed last Friday?

Mr. LENROOT. A publicity plank; yes.

Mr. CULLOP. To publish the contributions 15 days before election and every 3 days thereafter until election day, of all sums over and above $10.

Mr. LENROOT. To whom?

Mr. CULLOP. To the world.

Mr. LENROOT. Contributions to the political committees.

Mr. CULLOP. No; it must be filed with the Clerk of this House and then published. It then becomes public property.

Mr. LENROOT. Contributions only to the national political committees, and not contributions to individuals, while your platform promised publicity of all contributions. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CULLOP. This new law gives publicity of all contributions.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to take the time to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] one question. If contributions are made to you, as a candidate for Congress, and not to the national committee, where is your law requiring publicity?

Mr. CULLOP. I have no contributions made to me as a candidate; I do not need them. The Democrats can run their campaigns without contributions from special interests, and State laws regulate this matter. [Laughter.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, I shall vote against this bill in the form reported by the committee, because it is unjustly discriminatory against the farmers of this country, and favors the great trusts and monopolies. It will not reduce the cost of living to the consumer, because a high tariff remains on practically all food products that he uses. This bill can not be defended from a Republican standpoint, from the declarations of the last Republican platform, and I say further, Mr. Chairman—and I shall have something to say about it a little later on if I have the time—this bill can not be defended from a Democratic standpoint, from the last platform of the Democratic Party. But I propose in my discussion of this bill to discuss it from the standpoint of a Republican, believing in the doctrine of protection, the principle that duties should cover, and cover only, the difference in cost of production at home and abroad. The Republican Party in 1908 made a solemn pledge to revise the tariff in accordance with that principle. We all know what happened, and because the Payne-Aldrich law failed to fulfill that promise, progressive Republicans all over this country, with voice and pen, condemned that law and insisted that the pledge of the Republican Party, that duties should cover only the difference in cost of production at home and abroad, should be kept, and that there should be further reductions of tariff until that promise should be fulfilled to the letter.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman does not state all the platform, does he, with reference to the tariff? Did it not also provide that there should be a reasonable return to the manufacturer upon the money invested?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. That was a new departure.

Mr. LENROOT. It was; and it did not comply with the pledge with that clause put upon it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will admit that it was recreant in all of its pledges, if the gentleman desires.

Mr. LENROOT. It is now sought in many quarters to show that progressive Republicans are inconsistent in opposing this bill while at the same time demanding lower tariffs upon manufactured articles. They are not inconsistent, but, on the contrary, it is the advocates of this measure who are inconsistent. Progressive Republicans have never been free traders. [Applause on the Republican side.] I challenge anyone to point to any speech made by a progressive Republican in Congress or elsewhere advocating free trade. As a progressive Republican I stand to-day where I have stood in the past, for a protective tariff, measuring duties by the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. It is true that our demand for reductions has been confined very largely to manufactured articles, and in that we have been consistent. The evils of exorbitant tariff rates, as a general rule, are felt only where the product affected is controlled by a trust or monopoly. Until comparatively recently——

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I noticed that he stated he agreed with that part of the last Republican national platform which provides for a tariff equaling the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. Does the gentleman indorse the remainder of that platform which provided that the tariff should also be levied sufficient to insure a reasonable profit to the manufacturer?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I do not.

Mr. CULLOP. Does the gentleman indorse his party's action in passing the Payne tariff bill?

Mr. LENROOT. No; and neither did I in the campaign.

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman did not indorse that part of the Republican Party's procedure that passed and advocated the Payne tariff bill?

Mr. LENROOT. I did not.

Mr. CULLOP. Do you indorse the action of your party in passing the Payne-Aldrich bill?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not indorse the action of my party in passing the Payne-Aldrich bill. I thought I made that clear.

Mr. CULLOP. Does the gentleman claim that it is a violation of the party pledge?

Mr. LENROOT. I do.

Mr. CULLOP. Then, the gentleman's party has not always been keeping its pledges. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LENROOT. No; it has not. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.] And neither has yours.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend for a moment. The galleries are admonished that they should not applaud or show any evidence of approval or disapproval.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to say if my party had kept its pledge, there would have been a minority upon that side of the Chamber to-day instead of a majority. [Applause on the Republican side.] As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, the evils of exorbitant tariff rates are, as a rule, felt only where the products are controlled by trusts and monopolies. Until comparatively recently it made little or no difference how high tariff rates were, provided they were high enough to protect the American industry from excessive competition by foreign countries. With full and free competition at home, domestic prices were not measured by the foreign price plus the duty, and prices were kept upon a reasonable level. But great economic changes have taken place in recent years. Nearly all of the great industries have combined into gigantic corporations controlling our markets. Competition is gone and prices to the consumer are arbitrarily fixed by a few men. We have the Woolen Trust, the Cotton Trust, the Steel Trust, the Beef Trust. I will not attempt to enumerate them all. These conditions are familiar to every Member of this House and the country.

Destroying competition at home, they are able to dictate the prices upon their products, and there are only two limitations upon the prices which they may fix—first, the ability of the public to buy and, second, the foreign price plus present tariff rates. When we impose a tariff rate of 100 per cent, when a rate of 25 per cent would be sufficient to cover the difference in cost of production at home and abroad, then we give these trusts a license to plunder the American people. This is what progressive Republicans have been fighting; this is what they will continue to fight until justice is done.

We stand for a consistent policy applied alike to all classes of our people. We insist that if the protective theory shall prevail, the 6,000,000 farmers of this country are just as much entitled to the application of that theory to their products as the manufacturers are to their products. [Applause on the Republican side.] If, on the other hand, the theory of free trade is to be applied to the farmers, they insist, and rightly so, that that theory shall also apply to the manufacturers. [Applause.]

The President of the United States two years ago pronounced the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill the best tariff law ever enacted and criticized but one schedule, the wool schedule. To-day he has completely reversed his position and advocates free trade in agricultural products with Canada, our only competitor, but at the same time proposes a higher protection for many manufactured products than does the Payne-Aldrich bill, which has been condemned by the American people. I think that I shall be able to demonstrate before I get through that upon certain important manufactured products the rates proposed in this bill give their manufacturers from 50 to 75 per cent higher protection than the Payne-Aldrich law.

The President in his message to Congress says this bill—> is not a violation of the protective principle as that has been authoritatively announced by those who uphold it, because that principle does not call for a tariff between this country and one whose conditions as to production, population, and wages are so like ours, and when our common boundary line of 3,000 miles in itself must make a radical distinction between our commercial treatment of Canada and of any other country.

If free trade in agricultural products with Canada is not a violation of the protective principle for the reasons stated by the President, then the high rates upon manufactured products proposed in this bill are for the same reasons a violation of the protective principle.

If the President is correct in his statement, then every tariff rate in this bill upon every manufactured product is a violation of the pledge of the Republican Party that tariff rates should be based upon the difference in cost of production at home and abroad.

On the President's own statement, how can the rate proposed upon beef in this bill, of 1¼ cents per pound, be sustained, or 50 cents per barrel upon flour, and so with every manufactured product? If there is a difference in the cost of production between this country and Canada, the farmer is just as much entitled to protection as is the manufacturer, and this bill is a violation of the pledge of the Republican platform because it fails to give the farmer that protection. If there is no difference in the cost of production, then there should be free trade in manufactured products, and the bill is a violation of the pledge of the Republican platform because it proposes high tariffs upon those products. This country can not prosper, Mr. Chairman, and it has no right to prosper, if we adopt one policy as applying to one class of our people and a directly contrary policy as applying to another class. [Applause on the Republican side.] Let us have protection for all, or let us have free trade for all. [Applause.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. LENROOT. I do.

Mr. HILL. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will say that I am very much interested in what the gentleman has been saying as to the equality of protection. How do you reconcile the fact of 75 per cent to 100 per cent in different farmers' products?

Mr. LENROOT. That is true to a certain extent, and it is——

Mr. HILL. If equality is to be applied to all, why should not the woolgrower and wheat grower have the same equal percentage of duty? Why should not the lemon grower of California and the potato grower of Maine be put on the same basis?

Mr. LENROOT. Because the cost of production varies.

Mr. HILL. Does not the same principle apply to the cost of production between manufactured goods and farmers' products that applies between one farmer's products and another's?

Mr. LENROOT. It does; but the principle of the difference in cost of production should apply to all. I want to say to the gentleman from Connecticut that if there is no difference in the cost of production between this country and Canada in agricultural products, I am willing to vote for free trade in them, but if there is a difference I insist that we apply the principle of protection to them, and I wish the gentleman from Connecticut would do likewise.

Mr. HILL. But the gentleman said a moment ago that the bill now pending is a violation of the Republican platform, because it levied a duty on manufactured products and took it off from the farmers' products. Would not that be governed entirely by the difference in the cost of production, and how, if there was such a difference, could the platform be violated?

Mr. LENROOT. I am glad the gentleman brought that out. I was basing that statement solely upon the President's message, stating that there was no difference in cost of production, both as to manufactured products and as to agricultural products. And what I insisted was, with that premise, that both classes should be treated alike. [Applause.] I am aware of the fact that it is claimed that upon manufactured products Canada refused to agree to any lower tariff on imports into Canada. I do not question that statement, but it was entirely feasible to provide for absolute free trade with Canada upon all imports coming into this country upon Canada's making concessions by way of lower tariff upon imports into Canada from the United States, and if that had been done the agreement thus made would have been just as free from the claim that other countries would be entitled to free trade, because of the favored-nation clause in our treaties, as is the pending bill.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman in what he says about manufactures, but I want to ask him this question: Even though it be admitted that this bill is violative of your idea of protection as to manufactured articles, that they can be manufactured in this country, as I think they can, as cheaply as in Canada, does that affect, as far as it goes, the fact that farm products can be raised as cheaply as in Canada, and are you not violating your principle of protection when you insist, on any account, that the farmer should have a duty on wheat when he can raise it here as cheaply as he can in Canada?

Mr. LENROOT. I want to say to my friend from Texas that I do not for one moment insist that a farmer should have a duty on wheat if he can raise it as cheaply as a farmer in Canada, but I shall be able to show that the contrary is true, and that he can not do so; and that is my whole contention in this debate.

Mr. HARDY. I think the gentleman was objecting to the bill because it did not give the farmer the same protection that it does the manufacturer.

Mr. LENROOT. It does not.

The President in his message based his entire contention on the assumption that conditions were so similar in Canada that there was no difference in cost of production either in manufactured articles or agricultural products. If that is so, then we should apply the same principle to both manufactures and agricultural products.

Mr. HARDY. I agree with the gentleman on that proposition; but, as I understand it, the gentleman opposes the bill on the ground that the cost of production of wheat in this country is greater than in Canada.

Mr. LENROOT. It is greater.

If we now amend this bill by providing for free trade with Canada upon imports coming into this country, if it should be found to conflict with the favored-nation clause in our treaties—and I deny that it will—then it is only because the President has seen fit to make an agreement that did not provide for free trade, and no man has been heard to say, and no man will be heard to say, that Canada would not have been as ready to make the agreement if these greater concessions had been included.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], upon Saturday, made the statement that amendments to this bill would kill the agreement, and gave as his authority a statement of one of the Canadian commissioners. Now, I am sure that upon reflection neither the gentleman from Alabama nor any other lawyer in this Chamber will undertake to claim that by so amending this bill as to provide for free trade in imports from Canada to this country will in the slightest degree affect that agreement. I do not know how many Members are familiar with the Canadian bill. I hold a copy of it in my hand, and I want to say to the Democratic majority that you can place your free list that you propose in a separate bill as an amendment to this bill, and it will not affect one line or one letter of the bill now pending in the Canadian Parliament. Let me read one paragraph:

That it is expedient to provide—

I am reading now from the Canadian bill—that the act proposed to be founded on the foregoing resolutions shall not come into operation until a date to be named by the governor in council in a proclamation to be published in the Canada Gazette, and that such proclamation may be issued whenever it appears to the satisfaction of the governor in council that the United States Congress has enacted, or will forthwith enact, such legislation as will grant to Canada the reciprocal advantages provided for in certain correspondence dated Washington, January 21, 1911, between the Hon. P. C. Knox, Secretary of State, for the United States, and the Hon. W. S. Fielding, minister of finance, for Canada, and the Hon. William Patterson, minister of commerce, for Canada.

Now, will any gentleman claim that if we choose by amendment here to give to Canada greater concessions than she has asked Canada is going to object to that bill for that reason? No; no one will claim any such absurdity as that.

But, Mr. Chairman, if the policy of protection had been adhered to by the President, then the construction of this bill would have been radically different from what we find it. I assert, and shall be able to prove from the report of the President's own tariff board, that the cost of production of agricultural products is much less in Canada than in this country. And, on the other hand, I think I shall be able to show that the information at hand fairly establishes that the cost of manufacture of manufactured products is less in this country than in Canada.

First, as to the cost of production of agricultural products.

THE COST OF PRODUCTION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS IS LESS IN CANADA THAN IN THE UNITED STATES.

Let me say a word here with reference to this tariff board, whose figures I shall use. It was a matter of great satisfaction to me to find in the report of this tariff board, appointed to ascertain facts, that those facts were ascertained and presented to the Congress regardless of whether they sustained the President of the United States or not. [Applause on the Republican side.]

In the debate that we had here a few months ago upon the creation of a tariff commission the sole contention upon the part of those who opposed it upon the other side of the Chamber was that the members of this Tariff Board, being appointed by a Republican President, would be the creatures of the President. But in the first report that we have from that Tariff Board we find that that report sustains the President of the United States in scarcely a single one of his contentions. And now that we have this conclusive evidence of the independence of that Tariff Board, I shall hope that during this session of the Sixty-second Congress you gentlemen upon that side will be patriotic enough to reverse your positions and favor the creation of a permanent, nonpartisan tariff commission. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The report of President Taft's Tariff Board shows that the yield per acre of spring wheat in 1910 averaged 11.7 bushels per acre in the United States and 15.53 bushels per acre in Canada. In barley the yield in Canada was 24.62 bushels per acre; in the United States, 22.4 bushels. In oats the yield in Canada was 32.79 bushels per acre; in the United States, 31.9. In flaxseed the yield was 4.8 bushels per acre in the United States, while in Canada it was 7.97 bushels. In hay the yield in the United States was 1.33 tons per acre; in Canada it was 1.82 tons.

THE VALUE OF IMPROVED FARM LAND IS LESS IN CANADA THAN IN THE UNITED STATES.

I submit the following table contained in the report of the Tariff Commission, page 84:

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Can the gentleman explain to us why it is that the Canadian farmer's land is worth so much more and sells for so much less?

A MEMBER. Produces so much more.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not quite get the gentleman's question.

Mr. CARLIN. His question is, Why, when it produces so much more, it sells for so much less?

Mr. LENROOT. Because they have not the advantage of our markets; and you propose to give them that advantage, and when you do the price of their land will be the same—ours lower and theirs higher. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Is it the gentleman's contention that they do not sell any wheat in Liverpool?

Mr. LENROOT. They sell wheat in Liverpool.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Where do we sell ours?

Mr. LENROOT. We sell some wheat in Liverpool, but we use most of it ourselves.

Mr. CULLOP. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman is referring to the report of the tariff experts who have been in use by the President now for about two years?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman understands that the President made up his reciprocity measure from the report of that board, does he not?

Mr. LENROOT. I understand directly the contrary.

Mr. CULLOP. What was he having them for, if he was not using them for this purpose?

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman must ask some other person than myself.

Mr. CULLOP. Can the gentleman tell anything that this board has ever done in the two years that the President has had it, with an appropriation of over $500,000 to maintain it?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; I hold in my hand a report from this Tariff Board, full of information——

Mr. CARLIN. Republican information.

Mr. LENROOT. And if you gentlemen would read this information your action on this reciprocity bill might be different.

Mr. CULLOP. The action of the President, I understand the gentleman to say, was to run away from his own Tariff Board.

Mr. LENROOT. I can not go aside into a discussion of that question.

Mr. CULLOP. If the gentleman will yield for another question, do I understand him to say that the price of farm products in the United States is higher than in Canada?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; I do.

Mr. CULLOP. The gentleman regards Chicago as one of the leading wheat markets of this country?

Mr. LENROOT. I regard it as the greatest.

Mr. CULLOP. Was not the quotation on wheat in Winnipeg Saturday 2½ cents per bushel higher than it was in Chicago?

Mr. LENROOT. It might have been.

Mr. CULLOP. And more than 5 cents higher than it was in St. Louis and more than 6 cents higher than it was in Kansas City?

Mr. LENROOT. I would say in answer to the gentleman that that is not true so far as the same grades are concerned.

Mr. CULLOP. Was not the quotation of No. 1 wheat in Winnipeg at 91 cents a bushel and 88 cents in Chicago?

Mr. LENROOT. No; the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. CULLOP. That was the report in yesterday's papers, and is the correct quotation of the price.

Mr. LENROOT. I should be very glad to have the report put in the RECORD. The gentleman can not find it.

Mr. CULLOP. If the gentleman will look in the Chicago papers of yesterday which came here to-day he will find that to be true, and I will only be too glad to put the report in the RECORD. Now, I want to ask the gentleman a further question.

Mr. LENROOT. I can not yield further unless I can have more time. I want to say in reply to that before I forget it, with reference to the price in Chicago of wheat and the price in Winnipeg, that they are entirely different grades of wheat. The Winnipeg price is all on Nos. 1 and 2 Northern, the best wheat grown in the wide world, while the Chicago prices are on contract grades, or No. 2 red, as a rule.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman submit to a correction, or does he prefer I should wait?

Mr. LENROOT. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, in the interest of historical accuracy alone and at the gentleman's suggestion, I want to call attention to the fact that he entirely misquoted the productions in the other country on wheat. He quoted spring wheat in the United States at 11.73 bushels yield and spring wheat in Canada at 15.53. As a matter of fact, the great bulk of wheat in the United States is winter wheat, in which we excel Canada in the production per acre, and the great quantity of wheat in Canada is spring wheat. I have the figures from the Government report. It is 11.73 bushels, as he stated, on spring wheat, but it is 15.8 on winter wheat, our larger product, and it is 15.53 in Canada, her almost exclusive product, or about three-tenths bushel per acre less than the United States.

Mr. LENROOT. I can not yield further. I wish to correct the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. HILL. I have here the Yearbooks.

Mr. LENROOT. I have the report of President Taft's Tariff Board, and I am sorry, indeed, to find that the gentleman from Connecticut, who has struggled as hard as any Member in this House to secure the creation of a tariff board, is unwilling to abide by the figures submitted by that board. I find from the figures of the Tariff Board that the production of winter wheat in Canada is very much greater per acre than the production in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. HILL. I admit it; but I say that very little winter wheat is raised in Canada; it is spring wheat which they raise. I will give the figures to the gentleman in my own time.

Mr. LENROOT. The report shows that the yield is greater in spring wheat and winter wheat in Canada; greater in both. I have just introduced a table, Mr. Chairman, showing the values of improved farm lands in this country and Canada.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. For a question?

Mr. HARRISON of New York. On the matter of prices of farm commodities.

Mr. LENROOT. I have not got to that yet.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. The gentleman has discussed the prices of wheat.

Mr. LENROOT. I was discussing the yield, and not the prices. Mr. Chairman, immediately following this table in the report of the Tariff Board we find the following:

> In the great farming States of Iowa, Indiana, and Illinois the values of farm land are very much higher than in any of the Canadian Provinces. In Illinois and Iowa they are a little over twice as high as in Ontario.

From the table I have quoted it will be observed that in Wisconsin the value of improved farm land is given at $57 per acre, while in the great Province of Manitoba it is only $29.

THE COST OF FARM LABOR IS HIGHER IN THE UNITED STATES THAN IN CANADA.

I will submit a table taken from a report of the Tariff Board, page 85, which I ask leave to insert in my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks permission to put in his remarks certain tables which have been referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Average wages of agricultural labor, with board, in specified States, eastern Canada, and British Columbia, 1909.

Mr. LENROOT. This table shows conclusively that farm labor is much more costly in the United States than in Canada. In Wisconsin the cost per month runs from $24.39 to $28.57, while in the neighboring Province of Ontario it is only from $17.63 to $21.52.

Mr. LOBECK. How about Saskatchewan?

Mr. LENROOT. That is much higher, but compared with the States of Washington and Montana it is higher in the United States.

Mr. LOBECK. The price of farm labor in Saskatchewan——

Mr. LENROOT. I can not yield further.

Mr. LOBECK. I would like to say something on that.

Mr. LENROOT. The gentleman will have to do it in his own time.

THE PRICE OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS IS MUCH HIGHER IN THE UNITED STATES THAN IN CANADA.

According to the report of the Tariff Board, the average price of spring wheat received by the farmer in Canada in 1910 was 73.8 cents per bushel, while our farmers received 89.8 cents per bushel, or 16 cents per bushel more than the Canadian farmer received. According to the report of the Tariff Board, for his barley the Canadian farmer received 47.4 cents, while our farmers averaged 57.8 cents per bushel, or 10.4 cents more per bushel than the Canadian farmer. For his flaxseed the Canadian farmer received $2.07 per bushel, while our farmer received $2.30 per bushel, or 23 cents per bushel more than the Canadian farmer.

For his hay—and I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS] is in the Chamber—the Canadian farmer received $9.66 per ton, while our farmers received $12.26 per ton, or $2.60 per ton more than the Canadian farmer. It is true a few moments ago that the gentleman from Massachusetts did take certain figures out of the report of this Tariff Board with reference to a difference in favor of Canada, but if he had looked at the table showing the general averages and conclusions of the Tariff Board he would have seen that upon the average the farmer in this country received $2.60 per ton more for his hay than did the Canadian farmer.

From this report it appears, then, that in the raising of wheat the Canadian farmer has the advantage of a yield of 3.83 bushels per acre more than our farmer, in barley his yield is 2.22 bushels per acre greater, in oats 0.89 bushel per acre greater, in flaxseed 3.17 bushels per acre greater, and in hay his yield is 0.49 of a ton per acre greater. The cost of his land is from one-third to one-half less than ours, and the cost of his help is from 15 to 40 per cent less, and yet it is proposed to compel our farmers to compete with him upon a free-trade basis without giving to our farmers any compensation in substantially lower duties upon the things that they must purchase.

Upon Saturday the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] called as witnesses Senators GALLINGER and LODGE, members of the Senate committee who made the report upon the cost of living.

It will be remembered that he told us that that report conclusively showed that in prices the farmers of this country had no advantage over those of Canada, and that especially with reference to the price of wheat the price of wheat in this country was controlled by the world's market. In proof of that he read from the report, that upon a certain day or in a certain year wheat was 2 cents higher per bushel in Liverpool than it was in Chicago. That was true, but if the gentleman had turned to another page of the report he would have found that this same committee reports that the transportation rate from Chicago to Liverpool was 17 cents a bushel on wheat, so that when wheat is worth 2 cents more per bushel in Liverpool than it is in Chicago, it means that there is a difference in favor of this country, or a higher price, in other words, of 15 cents a bushel, the difference between the transportation rate of 17 cents and the higher price of 2 cents in Liverpool. The gentleman can not be allowed to impeach his own witness, but I will be fairer than he was. As a general rule I would not care to call those gentlemen as witnesses and abide by their conclusions, and I want to be entirely fair and say that the transportation rates that they give of 17 cents a bushel from Chicago to Liverpool is too high. The actual rate is about 11½ cents, and let me say this, that the transportation rate on wheat from Chicago to Liverpool is less than it is from Chicago to New York, showing conclusively that as in the case of lemons, after the Payne-Aldrich bill was passed, the railroads proposed to secure for themselves a portion of this higher price of grain in this country.

You remember how the gentleman from North Carolina drew a word picture of the insurgents and standpatters joining hands and waltzing around and singing hosannas and hallelujahs to the farmer. We remember that. I will ask you, Who is going to receive the benefit of this reciprocal agreement? I will tell you some of the people who will receive it. When this bill passes, the Beef Trust, upon the basis of their shipments into Canada last year, will save $239,213 in duties, increasing their profits to that extent when you pass this bill. The Agricultural Implement Trust will receive, from the reduction of tariff rates upon their exports into Canada, $218,488 annually. And, Mr. Chairman, I might draw another picture of the Democrats upon that side of the House joining hands with a Republican President and singing hosannas and hallelujahs to the Beef Trust and to the Agricultural Implement Trust. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I assert that the cost of manufacturing is, as a rule, less in this country than in Canada.

As to manufactured articles we have no report from the Tariff Board, presumably because there has not been sufficient time for the board to make an investigation of this question. We have, however, information of a general nature tending strongly to show that the cost of manufacturing is less in this country than in Canada. It is a significant fact that the Canadian Government has refused to permit free trade in manufactured articles imported from the United States. If the cost of manufacturing is greater in Canada than in this country, why this refusal on the part of Canada? She favors free trade in agricultural products, because it is shown that the cost of production is less in Canada than in this country. She opposes free trade in manufactured products presumably because the cost of manufacturing is greater in Canada than in this country.

But stronger evidence is at hand than conclusions to be drawn from the action of Canada. In 1910 our manufacturers shipped into Canada agricultural implements to the value of $3,900,000, upon which they paid a duty of from 17½ to 25 per cent ad valorem.

Portable engines to the value of $1,799,000 were shipped into Canada and paid a duty of 20 per cent ad valorem.

Automobiles to the value of $1,569,000 were shipped into Canada and paid a duty of 35 per cent ad valorem.

On the other hand, there were imported into the United States from Canada of these articles, agricultural implements to the value of $84,000; portable engines, none, so far as our records show; and automobiles, none. This, Mr. Chairman, in the absence of direct evidence as to the costs of production, must, I think, convince any impartial mind that the cost of manufacturing is, generally speaking, less in the United States than in Canada. I do not wish, however, to be understood as saying that the price to the consumer is less in the United States than in Canada, for I believe the contrary is true. I believe that an investigation will show that many manufactured products are shipped to Canada, the duty paid, and the price paid by the consumer there is less than the price paid by the consumer here.

If manufactured articles were admitted free from Canada it would compel our manufacturers, when they monopolize our markets, to lower the price to the consumers in the United States to the point where Canadian manufacturers could compete with and undersell them if they did not.

Earlier in my remarks I stated that I would try to demonstrate that the degree of protection granted to American manufacturers is greater in this bill than they now enjoy under the Payne-Aldrich law. In other words, as to many manufactured articles the protective duties are actually higher in this bill than in the Payne-Aldrich law.

I will first take wheat and the product of wheat, which is flour. The present tariff upon wheat is 25 cents per bushel. It requires 4½ bushels of wheat to produce 1 barrel of flour.

Now, it is a fact familiar to all who have studied tariff rates that we have two classes of rates, known as compensatory and protective rates. When a tariff is levied upon raw material, in considering the rate to be levied upon the manufactured product, the first question to be determined is how much of a duty shall be levied to compensate the manufacturer for the duty upon the raw material.

For instance, when we levy a rate of 25 cents a bushel on wheat, the manufacturer of flour is first entitled to a duty equal to that which would be laid if the flour was imported in the form of wheat. That duty in the case of flour is four and a half times 25 cents, or $1.12. This is only imposing a duty of 25 cents a bushel on the wheat in the flour, and thus far the manufacturer has received no protection whatever in the $1.12. This is the compensatory duty, and added to that is, or should be, a protective duty, covering the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad, if there be any such difference.

In the Payne-Aldrich law, while the duty on wheat is 25 cents per bushel, the duty on flour is 25 per cent ad valorem. The flour that we exported into Canada in 1910 was valued on the average at $5 per barrel. Twenty-five per cent of this sum is $1.25, which would be the duty upon a barrel of flour. This includes both the compensatory and the protective rate. The compensatory rate is, as I have shown, $1.12, leaving, under the Payne-Aldrich law, 13 cents per barrel as the protection to the manufacturer.

Now, what is proposed in this bill? Wheat is made free; so there is no compensatory rate to be considered. Therefore, if no higher protective rate was imposed than is contained in the Payne-Aldrich bill, the rate upon flour would be 13 cents per barrel. But what do we find? It is proposed to grant the flour manufacturer a tariff rate of 50 cents per barrel, or nearly 300 per cent more protection than he enjoys under the Payne-Aldrich law. [Applause.] I could go on and make the same demonstration as to beef, and every other manufactured article in the bill, where the raw material is admitted free, but I will not take the time to do so. Any Member can figure it out for himself, for it is merely a matter of computation.

Upon the question of flour, too, I would observe this, that this proposed rate of 50 cents a barrel is more than twice the entire cost of the manufacture of a barrel of flour. During the vacation I was at home. My own city of Superior, Wis., is a large milling center, destined, I believe, to become the largest upon the continent. I asked one of the mill experts there whether he could tell me what the cost of the manufacture of a barrel of flour was. He took his pencil and figured for a time, and replied that with a mill running fairly continuously the cost was 18 cents per barrel. I asked him if that included interest on the investment, because I wanted to get at this reasonable profit that has been spoken of. He said, "No." I asked him to figure that, and he did. He replied that it would be 3 cents a barrel. So he gave the entire cost of the manufacture of a barrel of flour, including interest on the investment, as 21 cents per barrel. And yet you are asking us to vote, and you Democrats are proposing to vote, for a tariff upon flour of 50 cents a barrel, or more than twice the entire cost of manufacture. It is just such things as these, Mr. Chairman, that endanger the whole policy of protection. Those who vote for this bill will be under the necessity of making some explanation of why they voted for free trade for one class of our people and a tariff rate of more than double the entire cost of manufacture for the manufacturer.

I understand that you gentlemen on the other side claim that you have another bill coming in here that is going to take care of that; that you propose to put those things upon the free list that we are criticizing now. Well, if you are in good faith in that, if you want to legislate for the country instead of trying to make political capital, why do you not put it as an amendment upon this bill? [Applause.] You can not be heard to say that it will endanger this agreement if you put that free list as an amendment to this bill, because there is no intelligent man upon that side of the Chamber—and I think most of them are intelligent—who will undertake to say that that will invalidate the agreement. Now, why do you not do it? What do you propose and what is your hope? Your hope is that you can pass that free list bill through this House, and that it will be vetoed by President Taft.

If you do not want that, put it as an amendment on this bill, and if the reciprocity bill is signed, as it would be, this would go with it, and then you would be entitled to some credit for legislating for the people of the United States instead of merely playing politics with great measures. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to have 10 minutes more.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, this bill will not reduce the cost of living, and that, I think, is now admitted on both sides of the Chamber. The people do not eat cattle upon the hoof, that are admitted free. They do eat beef, which will have a tariff of 1¼ cents a pound. The price of beef to the consumer will not be reduced. The Beef Trust will have an excuse for reducing the price of cattle to our farmers because of the increased supply, but there will be no reduction of price to the consumer, and the only result will be to increase the profits of the Beef Trust.

Wheat is free; but, as I have shown, there will remain a tariff of 50 cents a barrel upon flour.

Flaxseed is free, but linseed oil, which is controlled by the Oil Trust and is a product of flaxseed, will have imposed on it a tariff of 15 cents per gallon still. What is true with respect to the articles that I have named is true also of practically every other article of manufactured food products.

Mr. Chairman, there has never been a bill proposed before Congress upon which there has been so much misrepresentation as this bill. In the cities throughout the country this bill is being urged upon the ground that it will reduce the cost of living. In the country the attempt is being made to convince the farmer that it will not reduce the price of his products. In my judgment, neither statement is true. It will not reduce the cost of living, for a high tariff remains upon practically all food products that the people use. It will reduce the price to the farmer of agricultural products by means of the increased supply, but the only beneficiaries will be the manufacturers of food products, enabling them to pay still greater dividends upon their watered stocks.

When a Republican President joins with the foes of the protective system in forcing free trade upon a large class of people, I, so far as my conduct is concerned, shall insist upon a consistent policy and shall vote for free trade upon those articles of necessity which the farmer must use. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I will have more confidence in securing that compensation to the farmer if you will submit your free list, as I have indicated, as an amendment to this bill, and I challenge any Member on the other side of the House during this debate to furnish some good reason why you should not.

When a spirit of justice and equal treatment of all of our citizens shall again prevail, and it surely will, then I shall be ready to take up all of these questions and vote to place duties upon all products, whether of soil or factory, that are naturally produced in this country, based upon the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 50 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for 50 minutes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, at the outset I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, if the trade arrangement negotiated between the United States and Canada in 1854 had not been abrogated, in my humble judgment there would not be one man in a thousand on either side of the line to-day who would not earnestly oppose its abrogation. If the Louisiana Purchase had not been consummated and the Mississippi River had remained the western boundary of the Republic, there would have been a tariff wall along that boundary from Canada to the Gulf of Mexico; and if a proposition were to be made now to establish more liberal trade relations between the people on the east side and those on the west side of that line there would be frantic objection to it on both sides. The people on the east side would protest that they could not compete with the pauper labor and the cheap lands with fabulous producing capacity in Iowa and other sections in the West. The people west of the river would proclaim with as much vehemence that free competition meant disaster and ruin to their industries. It is safe to make these assertions, Mr. Chairman, because nobody can disprove them. I make them for the purpose of suggesting to the House the disposition of many people to protest against any change in existing conditions. Many seem to act upon the theory that the existing situation can not be improved, and they conjure up in their imaginations fears of all kinds of evil at the mere suggestion of a change. This seems to be true of some Members of this body in the consideration of the great measure that is pending before Congress at this time. They see in it all kinds of certain disaster, without a single beneficent aspect. This has been true of every great, progressive movement in the world's history. If, centuries ago, the people of the world had admitted that the earth was round, they surely would have fallen off into space when their heads were downward turned. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that some of the debates upon this question justify the criticism I have suggested. I read in the American Economist a few days ago a letter from my friend, the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], who recently paid a visit to the Dominion of Canada with a view, I presume, of investigating conditions there, so that he might vote intelligently upon this proposition. In that letter he said they were successfully raising wheat at this time as far north as 70° north latitude, about 200 miles north of the Arctic Circle, closer to the North Pole than to the boundary line between Canada and the United States. Perhaps he is right, but if I am correctly informed in relation to the geography and development of Canada, there is not a railroad within 600 miles of the seventieth degree of north latitude. It is possible that we can now find some excuse, some justification for the claim that Dr. Cook made to having discovered the North Pole. It may be that he got lost in a Canadian wheat field and what he found there was not the North Pole, but a big stack of wheat, waiting in cold storage for the reciprocity bill to go through in order that it might come down and create havoc in the wheat market at Minneapolis and Chicago. [Laughter.]

RECIPROCITY AND PROTECTION.

Mr. Chairman, this is a practical question to be determined from the standpoint of the two countries, and there are certain fundamental things that we may know as a matter of common knowledge. It is not necessary to go to the North Pole to find out whether wheat can be raised there successfully. It is not necessary to travel to the moon to understand the law that holds that luminary in its orbit. I think we know as much about that law as even the man in the moon knows. We should take a broad view of this measure and consider it from the standpoint of the whole country and not settle it altogether because of its bearing upon the production of codfish in Massachusetts or beans in Michigan or hops in Oregon. We should consider it from the standpoint of the future as well as of the present.

It is charged that this measure is un-Republican; that it is not in harmony with the Republican position upon the policy of protection. I hope I am a Republican. I think I am. I am a firm believer in the policy of protection, but my understanding of that policy is that it is designed to promote industrial development in our own country, designed to increase to the highest degree the opportunities for the employment of American capital and American labor. No person or class of persons has any vested right to protection against foreign competition. Protection can not be justly applied simply to increase the prices and profits of any class of producers. One industry has no right to claim protection simply because as a matter of public policy protection may be extended to another industry. The sole question should be the public welfare. Whenever and wherever reasonable customs discrimination in favor of a line of industries will promote the general good, that discrimination ought to be made, but when it will not promote the general good, either directly or indirectly, the discrimination should not be made. The wise application of the policy of protection will promote industrial growth and advance the public interests. While an unwise application of that policy may benefit a special class, it will retard industrial progress and operate against the common good. I believe that the best friends of the policy of protection are not those who insist upon the maintenance of unnecessarily high duties nor those who regard it as a special favor to any class of producers, but those who contend for duties only high enough to cover the difference in cost of production here and abroad, imposed only for the advancement of the common good.

I agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], who just addressed the House, that the same policy should be applied to the products of the soil as is applied to the products of the factory; that no distinction ought to be made in favor of one class as against another class, and that protective duties are justified only from the standpoint of the common welfare. If I did not firmly believe that the farmers of the United States can produce wheat, oats, barley, hogs, cattle, and every product of the farm as cheaply as they can be produced in Canada, I would not support this measure. Agriculture is the first industry in every country, and when the farmers are prosperous that prosperity is shared by every other line of business, and when the farmers are in hard lines general prosperity is impossible. The railroads, the factories, and the merchants depend primarily upon the farmers for business.

Our Democratic friends say this bill is one of their brood. Of course their progeny, like Laban's flocks, are so motley and variegated, so "ringstraked and spotted," that it is difficult to say what they may legimately lay claim to in the way of tariff legislation. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] If I remember correctly, under the McKinley tariff law a Republican administration negotiated a number of reciprocity treaties with foreign countries, lowering the rate of duties, and when the Democrats came into control of the Government under Grover Cleveland in 1893 they enacted a law that repealed every one of those treaties and made no provision whatever for such international trade arrangements as is embodied in the pending bill.

I have never understood that reciprocity was a part of the policy of a tariff for revenue only. This bill gives up nearly $5,000,000 of revenue a year; so it would be a contradiction in terms to call it a tariff for revenue only measure. Where does the revenue come in? Reciprocity is a corollary of the policy of protection. They neatly and logically dovetail into each other.

RECIPROCITY AND THE FARMER.

A great deal has been said, and a great deal more will be said, in the course of this discussion respecting agricultural conditions in the United States and in Canada and the relative cost of farm products in the two countries. Wheat seems to be occupying the spotlight in this discussion. Farm products are controlled more by the law of supply and demand and less by the cost of production than any other commodities. I have noticed that whenever any attempt has been made to liberalize our trade relations with the people in tropical countries we have been met with the argument that the standard of living is necessarily low in the Tropics; that generous nature supplies most of the food; that no fuel, little clothing, and comparatively little shelter are required, and therefore the people of the United States can not successfully compete with tropical people because of these vital differences in conditions.

Now, on the other hand, the assertion is made that we can not successfully compete in production with those who live to the north of us, where the climate is much more rigorous, where they require warmer clothes, more expensive shelter, more food, and more fuel. Judging from the character of the debates in Congress on this class of measures, one might naturally conclude that our country is the most unfortunate spot on God's green earth; that we can not compete with anybody or anything, anywhere, at any time. [Laughter and applause.]

While I am not willing to accept any such conclusion, I do not think we can successfully compete in many lines of production with densely populated countries where wages are low, labor efficient, and the standard of living greatly below our own. But consider the fundamental conditions as they exist in Canada in relation to agriculture.

I have no doubt you can go to Manitoba or Saskatchewan or Alberta and with a pad and a pencil reckon the price of land, the cost of labor, seed, tools, and implements, and the yield of a quarter section of wheat, and by the process of mathematical reckoning ascertain the cost of production of wheat there by the bushel. By the same method the cost of production of wheat on a quarter section of land can be ascertained in Minnesota, Oklahoma, or Missouri, and it is possible that the farm cost will be slightly less in Canada. It will be discovered that the cost of living, labor, implements, and machinery is as high in the three Canadian Provinces as it is in this country, but land is cheaper there. Production, however, includes marketing and our advantage in that respect more than offsets the cheapness of Canadian land. The farmers of Kansas and Nebraska can produce and deliver wheat in Liverpool, the world's market, at a smaller cost than can the farmers of Manitoba or Saskatchewan. But the American farmer has other great advantages over the Canadian farmer aside from facilities for transportation and marketing. When I speak of the Canadian farmers in this connection I refer to the farmers in the prairie Provinces west of the Red River of the North.

BENEFITS OF DIVERSIFIED FARMING.

In this country farming is diversified. Our farmers raise wheat, oats, corn, cattle, and hogs. Crops grow in this country eight months in the year and cattle and hogs grow all the year through. Our farmers have something growing into money all the time. They find employment on the farm, more or less, 12 months in every year. On account of the climate the Canadian farmer raises only small grains. He can not raise corn and of course can not raise cattle and hogs with great success on that account. His crop is planted, harvested, and marketed within five months, and during the other seven months he has little employment on the farm. He has little, if anything, growing into money. Many Canadian farmers leave their farms during the long winter months and work for wages in the forests and the coal mines. In diversified farming each crop is raised at a smaller cost than is possible where only one kind of grain is raised. They say land is cheap in Canada. It is as compared with some land in the United States.

But there is a great difference in the value of lands in the United States. Some lands in this country can be bought for $2 an acre, while there are great areas of farm lands that are worth $200 an acre. Why is this difference? It is because of the difference in the producing capacity of the lands. Canadian lands will never be worth anything near as much as the lands in Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, and some other States in the Union.

Mr. WARBURTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will yield for a question.

Mr. WARBURTON. Is it not a fact that in the same longitude, 5 miles on either side of the boundary, the land on the United States side is worth twice what the same quality of land is on the other side?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Well, that is possible; that is very likely. It is not altogether the difference in producing capacity that makes the difference in the value of the land in this country and in Canada. I will be frank. Western Canada is sparsely settled and poorly developed as compared with this country. Under its last census the density of population in Canada was a man and a quarter to a square mile of area. It is not organized, and there are some other reasons. It has not the market facilities that we have.

Mr. WARBURTON. Is it not just as necessary for the farmer along the boundary line in the United States to go to the mines in the winter as it is for the farmer on the Canadian side to do that?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The closer to Canada the greater is that necessity, I conceive.

Mr. WARBURTON. And the fact is this——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I guess the gentleman is right about that.

Mr. WARBURTON. That in the Dakotas and in Montana and all along that line those same conditions prevail, and the farmers, just like the Canadian farmers, must farm to wheat and nothing else, practically.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes; and that is one reason why the lands in the United States along the Canadian border are not worth much and they will never be worth much, compared to lands better located. Take any country that can produce only small grains and experience has demonstrated that in a comparatively few years of successive cultivation the capacity of the land to successfully produce is greatly reduced. Last year the average yield of wheat in North Dakota was 5 bushels to the acre. They raised a little flint corn in that State, and the average yield was 14 bushels to the acre.

Mr. CLINE. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether in a combination of crop raising like we have in this latitude they do not raise the crop that they raise in a one-crop country like Canada cheaper and make more money on it, though if raised alone here it would cost more than in the one-crop country?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is exactly my contention. They raise all of the crops at a smaller cost because of the diversification. If one crop only is cultivated, its failure means distress; but if that crop is a success, much time and money are lost, because the tenant is employed only for that one crop. He and his land must be idle more than if his farming consisted of several kinds of crops and the raising of meat and dairy animals besides. Different kinds of crops permit of rotation and the consequent keeping up of the fertility of the land. Canada is a one-crop country.

A quarter section of good prairie land in the State of Illinois will produce more, one year with another, and is worth more than two average sections in the prairie area of western Canada. Canada is poorly developed; there is much uncultivated land in its western Provinces. I read a recent history of Canada, written by an Englishman. He said that after successive cultivation of five years in small grains the producing power of the western lands begins to decline. They can not rotate with corn, they can not raise clover, and the wise farmers in Manitoba and Saskatchewan advertise and sell their improved lands after five or six years of cultivation and buy new and unimproved lands, to get the benefit of their virgin fertility.

Mr. HELGESEN. I live in North Dakota. The gentleman from Indiana has stated the yield of wheat and corn last year, and I would like to know if he wants the people to believe that is the average of North Dakota in raising wheat and corn?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I just referred to last year. I have the crop report of the Agricultural Department to support the statement.

Mr. HELGESEN. I want to tell the gentleman that I have lived there for 25 years, and there has never been a year that we did not raise more than double that quantity until last year, which was an exception.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. But you do not raise any corn.

Mr. HELGESEN. The corn crop is increasing every year.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. You only planted two or three hundred thousand acres last year, while your neighbor, South Dakota, planted between two and three million acres in corn.

Mr. HELGESEN. Twenty-five years ago they did not have any more than we have.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It seems that the further you get away from Canada the better your lands will produce.

Mr. HELGESEN. We will discuss that later.

SCOPE OF THE MEASURE.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I would be glad if this measure were broader in its scope. I have no doubt that we can manufacture commodities as cheaply in the United States as they can in Canada along almost every line. We ought to be able to do so. Our industrial organization is infinitely better than the industrial organization of Canada. We can employ machinery in manufacturing to the very highest possible advantage and Canada can not because her market is more limited. I would be glad to have substantially all manufactured commodities on the free list between this country and Canada. But it takes two to make a bargain, and the Canadian representatives refused to make further concessions on manufactures. They looked across the line into this country and saw what wonderful progress we have made under the policy of protection; how we have built up our magnificent home markets and maintained the highest standard of wages and the highest standard of living of any people on earth, and it seemed good to them. Several years ago Canada adopted the same policy, and one result has been to cause a large number of American establishments to build branch factories in Canada to supply the market there and escape the Canadian tariff. Those branch factories employ Canadian labor and are building up the Canadian home market for the benefit of the farmers, railroads, and producers there. While the reciprocity agreement is not as comprehensive as I would like to have it, it is a large step in the right direction and doubtless will lead to a still more liberal policy.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will yield for a question.

Mr. COOPER. Just for a question. The gentleman said he would have been glad to have seen farm implements put upon the free list. The gentleman was on the committee, I think, and he ought to remind the House of this fact, which he remembers, that the Payne tariff law put agricultural implements on the free list that come from other countries that admit them into their ports free of duty.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. And the tariff is only 15 per cent, and the reason they have not gone on the free list is that other countries will not consent to it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is a pertinent statement to put in my remarks at this juncture, and I thank the gentleman for it. We have now reciprocal free trade in agricultural implements with the world, and the only reason we have not been able to get into Canada with our implements free of duty is because Canada will not make the concession.

PRICES IN THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA.

Much has been said about the comparative price of commodities on this side of the line and on the Canadian side, and the price of wheat has been quoted in Winnipeg, Minneapolis, and Chicago. It is true that for the last six or eight years the price of wheat in Minneapolis, for instance, has been on an average about 8 cents a bushel above the price in Winnipeg. It is about 8 cents on the average, but at times it has been as high as 14 cents, and at other times the price has been on an absolute level, with possibly a fraction of a cent in favor of Winnipeg. But what does that mean; what does it signify? How much does it cost to ship a bushel of wheat from Winnipeg, the center of the wheat market in Canada, to Minneapolis, 600 or 700 miles distant? The cost of transportation may cover the difference in the price and more.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield for a question.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. May I be permitted to suggest that Winnipeg has no market?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It has the same kind of a market as Chicago, on a smaller scale.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It is the lake ports, Port Arthur and Port William.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Winnipeg is the register; it is like Liverpool and Chicago. The price in the country, in the elevators, is the Winnipeg price plus what it would cost to get the product there, though it never goes to Winnipeg. Winnipeg is simply a barometer which registers prices; that is all.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Did I understand the gentleman to say the price is fixed, with regard to wheat, at Winnipeg?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Why, of course; if wheat is worth a certain price at Winnipeg, it means that anybody who has wheat can sell it to a Winnipeg merchant and get the Winnipeg price for it, but out of that price he must pay the cost of getting the wheat to Winnipeg. Let me give some prices in our own country. I quote from the Crop Reporter, issued by the Department of Agriculture, showing the farm price of corn, wheat, and barley in the several States on the 1st day of December, 1910. The price of corn in North Dakota was 58 cents a bushel and in South Dakota it was 40 cents a bushel, a difference of 18 cents a bushel in these two States lying side by side. Did the tariff make that difference?

On the same day the price of wheat in Nebraska was 80 cents a bushel and in Minnesota it was 94 cents a bushel. Did the cheap wheat in Nebraska demoralize the wheat market in Minneapolis?

On the same day the price of barley in Nebraska was 45 cents a bushel, while in South Dakota the price was 57 cents a bushel. These differences in prices of grain in adjoining States were as great as the difference in the price of wheat on that day between Winnipeg and Minneapolis, and yet it is claimed that the higher price in Minneapolis over Winnipeg was the result of the tariff. There are many other instances in the Crop Reporter as striking as those I have quoted. They are chiefly due to local conditions.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I might suggest that Winnipeg does not deal in wheat except the wheat that is in store at lake ports, and the price in Winnipeg is the price at the lake ports.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Locate the market, then, on the lakes. I do not care. I am using it for the purpose of illustration. I do not care where it is located. I am quoting now the Winnipeg prices, because they are the prices that are quoted in all the price lists. I believe the tariff does have something to do with it. I believe prices would be somewhat higher in Winnipeg on an average under free trade in farm products, but they would not be appreciably affected in this country. I will tell you why.

TRANSPORTATION FACILITIES.

Canada has not the transportation facilities nor the elevator advantages nor the commercial and industrial organization that this country possesses. With a larger area than the entire United States, including Alaska, Canada has only 24,000 miles of railroad, while this country has 240,000 miles. We have great trunk lines of railroads running from ocean to ocean and from the Lakes to the Gulf, with feeders going out into every fertile valley, into every good producing section all over the country, with abundant elevator facilities. The American farmer has a tremendous advantage over the Canadian farmer in these conditions, and they affect the prices of products and have a powerful bearing upon the prosperity of the farmer.

Another thing. The remarkable decrease in the cost of transportation in this country in modern years has brought the farm price of wheat and of the staple food products and the Liverpool price closer and closer together each year, until to-day wheat on the farm is worth relatively more than it ever was before in the history of the country. In 1868 it cost 42 cents a bushel to ship wheat by rail from Chicago to New York; it cost about 50 cents to send that bushel of wheat from Chicago to Liverpool. To-day wheat can be carried from Chicago to New York by rail at 10½ cents a bushel, and to Liverpool for 2½ cents more. Yes; for less than that, because a small differential is made by the railroads in favor of the export product, and wheat can be shipped from Chicago to Liverpool for 12 cents a bushel. The average freight rate in the country is 7½ mills, or just a trifle over, per ton-mile. The railroads carry wheat from Chicago to New York for less than 3 mills per ton-mile. Why do they do it? In the early seventies there occurred that great railroad-rate war between the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., the New York Central Co., and the Baltimore & Ohio Co.—one running into Philadelphia, one into New York, and the other into Baltimore. A differential rate was finally agreed upon in favor of Philadelphia and Baltimore large enough to overcome the port advantages of New York City in the foreign trade, and the exporters in those cities were placed upon an equal footing. The contest then became a battle of enterprise and economy on the part of the merchants in New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, and as the contest continued every unnecessary element of cost was eliminated and the western farmer received the benefit. The conditions developed by that rate war are largely entitled to the credit for the high price of lands in the Western States to-day.

COMPETITION BETWEEN SEABOARD AND GULF.

Then railroads leading to the Gulf ports were extended and ramified, and west of the Father of Waters, and even east of it, farm products secured the benefit of competition between the Gulf and the Atlantic seaboard. Some years ago the eastern and western railroads gave a rate on grain from the Mississippi River to the seaboard of 85 per cent of the Chicago rate. They had to make the concession to meet the competition to the South. And I tell you, Mr. Chairman, the competition in transportation in this country, East and South, has given us rates and other facilities that from the nature of things can never be had in Canada, except in a limited measure through the operation of free commercial intercourse between the two countries. Suppose we should abolish the tariff, what would be the effect? Would our wheat go down in price? No; our wheat would not go down; but the Canadian railroads and steamboats, that have practically no competition now in carrying the Canadian wheat from the western wheat fields to the market at Liverpool, would be compelled to meet competition by way of Duluth, Chicago, and New York, and even to the Gulf. Rates of transportation would go down in Canada or Canadian lines would lose that trade. The result would be that the Canadian wheat grower would get better prices for his wheat, without in any manner affecting the price of American wheat. He would buy more American-made products to his advantage and our benefit.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will yield.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. In that case will the consumer get bread any cheaper?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Why, he may not get bread any cheaper. I am not advocating cheaper bread. I am advocating a policy that will increase the ability of the American consumer to buy bread and all the other necessaries and comforts of life.

I am advocating the upbuilding of our home market and the expansion of our foreign trade, and I am not worrying now about the price of bread. It does not enter into my philosophy just now.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is not this proposition predicated upon the theory that the consumer will be benefited by cheaper prices?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is my privilege to arrange my own postulates.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes, and the gentleman is arranging his postulates to suit himself.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is immaterial. I want to submit some figures about prices which will——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My question is pertinent to the question the gentleman is now considering. I want to ask if the railroads of this country would do a greater business by reason of the increased amount of freight that would come to them from the Canadian market?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It would increase some. It would compel the Canadian railroads and the Canadian ship lines to reduce rates and take care of their own products or lose the business, and the result would be higher prices in Winnipeg and that part of Canada.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman spoke of a reduction of freight rates on railroads and steamboats. I was curious to find out whether in his judgment he believed the railroads and steamboats would reduce their rates under reciprocity.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My opinion is that Canadian transportation companies would be compelled to reduce rates or lose much of their carrying trade.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I want to know if the introduction of Canadian wheat into this country would have a tendency to keep the Minneapolis price anywhere near the Liverpool price?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not know that it would affect the Minneapolis price appreciably.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. During the year 1910, for about three months during that year, is it not a fact that Minneapolis prices were above the Liverpool price?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That may be true, and it was probably the result of local conditions growing out of gambling operations on the boards of trade, generally after the farmers have marketed their crops. The gentleman must excuse me from yielding further. I must proceed along my own line of thought.

RELATION OF FOREIGN PRICES TO HOME PRICES.

I had the Secretary of Agriculture prepare this table, giving the price of wheat in Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal, New York, and Liverpool for the last five years—the average price during each month of each year, beginning with 1906. In that table I find there is substantially a fixed relation between the average Liverpool price throughout the year and the prices at the cities I have mentioned. The price in this country is generally about 5 or 6 cents a bushel higher in relation to the Liverpool price than the Winnipeg price is, showing that American farmers get their wheat to Liverpool cheaper than the Canadian farmers can get theirs there, for wheat from both countries sells at the same price at Liverpool. If we open up this channel of trade, Winnipeg can get her wheat to Europe about as cheaply as we can get ours there.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will ask the gentleman if that will do any good to our people?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It will enable Minneapolis millers to mix Minnesota soft wheat with Canadian hard wheat, and in that way improve the quality of flour, for one thing.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I would say to the gentleman that our wheat is a hard wheat, and the gentleman is mistaken as to the character of our wheat. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Now, if the gentleman will pardon me, I promise I will not say anything more that is not polite about Minnesota or her products. [Laughter.] I have heard, however, that they do buy hard wheat in Canada to mix with soft Minnesota wheat, to improve the quality of the flour. The gentleman need not answer that aspersion, as what I heard was doubtless gossip. [Laughter.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will admit that the gentleman is right if he will allow me to go on without interruption. I do not know what he is going to say, but I will admit it in advance. [Laughter.] Wheat prices in this country always have depended principally upon wheat prices in Liverpool. This will be the case as long as we export any substantial portion of our annual product. For some years our exports of wheat have averaged about 100,000,000 bushels a year. Canada exported about 50,000,000 bushels last year. We can not relieve ourselves from competition with the Canadian surplus. We may keep it out of our own markets, but we must meet it in Liverpool, where the world's price is registered.

There have been times when the price in this country was too high for export, depending upon local conditions. Conspiracies by grain gamblers on the boards of trade to "corner" the markets have even raised the prices here, temporarily, above the prices in Europe. Just before harvest in 1902 oats sold on the Board of Trade in Chicago at 16 cents a bushel above the price at any market within a radius of 500 miles from Chicago. That price was the result of a "corner" operated by Patten Bros., and like most all operations of that kind it occurred when the oat raisers had none to sell. One of the most beneficent features of the reciprocity measure is that it will tend to stableize grain markets and minimize the evils of grain gambling.

The total yield of wheat in this country for 1910 was 737,189,000 bushels, of which 464,044,000 bushels were winter wheat and 231,399,000 bushels were spring wheat. Canada's total yield for the same year was 149,989,000 bushels, of which 16,610,000 were winter wheat and 133,379,000 bushels were spring wheat. The winter wheat was produced chiefly in the Province of Ontario.

OUR TRADE WITH CANADA.

In 1910 the United States sold to Canada $34,432,000 worth of farm products—sold that value of farm products into the country of cheap labor and cheap land with great capacity for production. Over 16 per cent of all our sales to Canada consisted of farm products. We sold over $7,000,000 of breadstuffs, $4,000,000 of animals, $3,000,000 of meats and dairy products, $5,000,000 of fruits and nuts, $8,000,000 of raw cotton, and so on down the line. Canada sold to us in that year $9,000,000 worth of farm products. Only 9.3 per cent of her exports to the United States were farm products.

Those figures are significant, Mr. Chairman, showing that under existing conditions, with a substantial tariff on the Canadian side on all farm products excepting corn, we can invade her markets and sell our products there in large quantities.

We bought $33,000,000 worth of lumber from Canada and sold her $7,000,000 worth. Her total foreign trade last year was $571,000,000 in round numbers. Her trade with us was $285,000,000, leaving only $286,000,000 with all the balance of the world, $232,000,000 of which was with the United Kingdom.

Our total sales to Canada in 1909 were $192,661,000, and Great Britain's sales to Canada that year were $86,257,000. We sold to Canada $106,000,000 worth of goods more than she bought from the mother country, notwithstanding the fact that Canada extends to the mother country a preferential tariff rate 33⅓ per cent below the rate she imposes against the United States.

What does it mean? It means that it will require a tariff wall higher than any that has yet been established to overcome and destroy the natural disposition on the part of the people of these two countries to cooperate, to do business back and forth, to exchange commodities when it is to their mutual advantage to do so. Canada is the third best customer we have in all the world, and, taking cotton out of account, she ranks second. With her 7,000,000 people she bought more from the United States last year than we sold to all the Republics in South America and all the countries in Asia combined, with their 700,000,000 aggregate population! Progressive, increasing in population, developing as she is and will be, the higher the tide of her prosperity the better customer she will become for the United States and the more valuable our intercourse will become to her. When she reaches the 20,000,000 point in population, at the present ratio of business, she will be the best customer the United States has in the entire world.

Trade is generally profitable to both parties, as it should be. Canada raises very little corn. There was produced last year in all the Provinces only about 25,000,000 bushels, as against 3,000,000,000 bushels produced in this country, and Canada's only corn Province is Ontario. The western farmers of the United States are not concerned about Ontario, nor Quebec, nor the maritime Provinces, but they do feel some concern about Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta. But a country that can not raise corn can not successfully raise beef cattle or hogs, and a country, I repeat, that can not grow clover to fertilize its land, that can not rotate its small grains with corn, can not for any considerable length of time keep up that fertility of the soil that is necessary to produce large yields of wheat and other small grains.

Ah, gentlemen of the House, the fear of Canadian competition on the part of the American farmer, it seems to me, is altogether fanciful. If you go to the Illinois farmer or the Iowa farmer and ask him what he thinks about the danger of competition with a country that can not produce corn, hogs, or cattle, he will look upon you as a freak.

CANADIAN LAND BOOM.

But there are boomers in Canada. They are advertising the wonderful fertility of their soil and the cheapness of the land and the salubrity of their climate. A few years ago fertile lands in the State of Mississippi were advertised in the part of the country where I live at ridiculously low prices, and many of my neighbors disposed of their property and went to Mississippi and bought lands. Those lands felt the effects of the boom and increased in price somewhat, but after a few years of experience every investor that I know of, excepting one, disposed of his Mississippi purchase and came back to good old Indiana a wiser, if not a wealthier, man. It was another Mississippi bubble—a will-o'-the-wisp excursion.

Of course the Canadian lands will all be cultivated in the course of years, and they will support a considerable population, but I want to emphasize the fact that from no standpoint can the Canadian farmer be a dangerous competitor of the American farmer. He is handicapped by both drouth and frost and by the inevitable depreciation of soil fertility characteristic of all small grain regions. This is especially true where the chief crop is spring wheat. Experience in this country shows that when the virgin fertility of the soil is exhausted in spring wheat cultivation, and it only requires a few years of successive cultivation to do that, the land can never be recruited to successfully produce spring wheat thereafter. The first few crops yield abundantly and then the inevitable depreciation begins. This has been the experience of all our prairie States. That is not the case with winter wheat, however. Land in the valley of the Danube that has been farmed for a thousand years produces winter wheat as abundantly as it ever did. Its strength is maintained by rotation of crops and by artificial fertilization, methods that have never succeeded in spring wheat growing.

Talk about raising cattle and hogs in Canada! They have no corn to feed them. They feed all the oats they raise to their horses and sheep. Oats, hay, and barley are all the feed they have. The winters are two months longer in Canada than they are in the part of the country in which I live, and they have to feed stock that much longer every year. Is Canada a dangerous competitor of ours under these conditions? Ah, Mr. Chairman, these conditions are fundamental. They are vital, and they can not be gotten rid of. I was a farmer when I was a young man, and I know something about raising corn and oats, and wheat and cattle.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. That was a long time ago.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes; a long time ago.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman made his money early.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes; I am past 35 now. The Tariff Board appointed by the President under the Payne tariff law made an investigation of relative conditions in this country and Canada recently touching farming and stock raising. Their report was submitted to Congress on the 1st day of last month. The report shows that wages of farm hands are fully as high in western Canada as they are in the United States. The report also shows that prices of farm animals are higher in Canada than they are in this country. I read, in this connection, extracts from the report, showing the prices of horses, cattle, hogs, and sheep in the two countries:

HORSES.

Prices of horses range from $106 to $125 per head in Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and New York. In Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and North Dakota the range is from $111 to $126, and in Montana, Idaho, and Washington from $80 to $108. In eastern Canada prices of horses range from $107 to $139 per head, while in western Canada the range is from $107 to $156. In the great agricultural States of Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa prices range from $120 to $124. In all the Canadian Provinces, except Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, and Nova Scotia, the prices are higher than in any of our States.

As to horses, Canada has no surplus of importance outside of Ontario. The agricultural development of the northwestern Provinces has put prices of work stock and heavy draft teams at a premium in the territory tributary to Winnipeg. During the spring of 1910 it is stated on good authority that not less than 20,000 horses were sold out of Ontario alone for shipment to the market just mentioned, and prospective loss of this trade is giving Ontario some concern at this time. The five Provinces of Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta combined have but 1,863,744 head, as compared with 1,600,000 head now in the State of Iowa alone.

DAIRY COWS.

Prices of dairy cows range from $33 to $39 a head in Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and New York. In Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and North Dakota the range is practically the same. In the western border States of Montana, Idaho, and Washington the range is from $41.80 to $46.50. In eastern Canada prices of dairy cows range from $32 to $48 and in western Canada from $39 to $41. The highest Canadian price quoted is $48 in Ontario, as against $46.50 in Montana, the highest American price.

CATTLE AND SWINE.

Prices of other cattle vary in the United States from $14.30 a head in Minnesota to $27.40 in Montana, while in Canada the range of prices is from $31 in Saskatchewan to $34 in Ontario.

Prices of swine are slightly higher in Canada than in the United States. In our eastern border States—Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and New York—they range from $10 to $11.10. In the great agricultural States of Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa prices of swine vary very little from those already quoted. In eastern Canada the range of swine prices is from $10 to $13 and in western Canada from $12 to $13. The highest American price is $11.80 a head in Wisconsin, as against the highest Canadian price of $13 a head, which is quoted for Quebec, Manitoba, and Saskatchewan.

SHEEP.

Prices of sheep are much lower in the United States than in Canada, due to the fact that Ontario specializes on pedigreed flocks, as appears later on. In the United States they range from $2.90 per head in Texas to $5.30 in Illinois and Iowa, while in Canada the range is from $4 in Nova Scotia to $7 in Ontario, Manitoba, and Saskatchewan.

While the sheep industry in Canada at the present time is a minor one, the feeding of lambs for market has been an important business in Ontario, as many as 125,000 head having been exported as late as 1907 to the United States and 33,000 in the same year to Great Britain. The surplus has now dwindled, however, to such an extent that practically none was received at the Buffalo stockyards during 1910. In fact, it is reported that a few American-fed lambs have been shipped from Buffalo to Toronto, indicating that Ontario at the present time is scarcely supplying her own wants in this regard. This is, however, an abnormal condition.

I will insert in my remarks a table showing sales to and purchases from Canada of horses, cattle, meat and dairy products, and breadstuffs for the last five years:

Government statistics for five years ending June 30, 1910.

Horses:
We sold in Canada	$14,172,075
Canada sold to us	2,549,201
Difference in our favor	11,622,874
Cattle:
We sold in Canada	1,578,179
Canada sold to us	1,193,796
Difference in our favor	384,383
Meat and dairy:
We sold in Canada	17,011,017
Canada sold to us	904,191
Difference in our favor	16,106,826
Breadstuffs:
We sold in Canada	31,596,556
Canada sold to us	6,679,884
Difference in our favor	24,916,672

BENEFITS OF RECIPROCITY.

The question is asked, "Where are the benefits of reciprocity with Canada?" I will endeavor to suggest some of them. It will enable people on this side of the boundary line and the people on the other side to trade along natural channels. We should not artificialize markets where it is not necessary to do so. Take the item of coal. Canada has a duty of 53 cents a ton on coal, and we had a duty of 67 cents until the Payne law, and now it is 45 cents.

That duty shuts Nova Scotia coal out of some of the markets in New England. They are now supplied by coal chiefly from West Virginia, but the duty enables Nova Scotia to ship coal 200 or 300 miles farther west than could be done otherwise, and it takes from Pennsylvania and Ohio and Indiana their natural market for coal in Ontario and Quebec. If we had free coal with Canada, Nova Scotia would sell a little more coal to New England—not much; her dutiable coal is inferior in quality to the coal of West Virginia. We would sell more coal to the Provinces north of us, and the consumers of coal in Ontario and Quebec would obtain better coal at a lower price. It would help on both sides of the line. The advantage would be largely with us, because we have better industrial organization and better facilities for transportation. It would operate that way in a great many channels and along a great many lines. Unnecessary transportation is an economic waste. This arrangement would save much unnecessary transportation. These two peoples do not need the trade barrier between them that has existed for a century. It serves no beneficent purpose to either country.

Who are opposing this bill? Every "standpatter" and every friend of "special interests" in the country are against it. These patriots have suddenly become the champions of the "downtrodden" farmer. Whence this new-born zeal for the tiller of the soil? The bill provides for free lumber, a provision that ought to be hailed with delight by every fair-minded man in the country.

The high price of lumber has become a great burden to the people, and the bill, if it becomes a law, will afford some relief. The Bureau of Corporations recently investigated the subject of timber holdings in this country and discovered an alarming condition of things. It was found that a few wealthy syndicates now own and control millions upon millions of acres of the most valuable timber in the country. Those syndicates do not manufacture lumber, but they hold the timber until they can get their own price for "stumpage" from the millmen. They have made hundreds of millions of dollars from the increase in the price of stumpage. These timber barons confer no benefit upon society. They add nothing to the wealth or welfare of the country, but they grow rich off the necessities of the people. They are now making frenzied appeals through the press and other agencies for the protection of the farmers against the baleful Canadian reciprocity movement. Their hearts are wrung with anguish lest the farmer may suffer an injustice. Great patriots they surely are!

Placing lumber on the free list will alone compensate for every concession made by our Government.

Horses in the western Canadian country are higher in price than they are in the United States. Reciprocity will open up a market for American horses, a market for fruits and vegetables, especially early fruits and vegetables, and many other things. There are a great many things that we can obtain from Canada and many things Canada may obtain from us to the advantage of both countries. There are a great many advantages which I have not time to enumerate, and I do not see any serious disadvantage to either country.

I believe when I cast my vote for this measure I will have voted to advance the welfare of the farmers and all classes of producers in the United States. The talk about discrimination against the farmer is without justification. No sane man in America would purposely discriminate against the farmer. The chief benefit the American farmer derives from the policy of protection is an indirect one. The chief benefit he gets under the policy of protection is in the stimulation it gives to factories and the employment of American laborers at good wages, who buy and consume the products of the farm and thereby make good prices.

What was our campaign slogan in 1896, when the country was in distress? The Democratic leaders said, "Open the mints to free coinage of silver." Our leaders said, "Open the mills and give labor employment." [Applause on the Republican side.] Put money in the pocket of the toiler, so he will be able to buy and consume of the products of the farm and the factory. The people accepted the advice of the Republican Party. McKinley was elected President, the Dingley tariff went into operation, the mills were opened, and they have been open from that day to this. Labor throughout the country was steadily employed at good wages and has been steadily employed ever since. Wage earners bought and consumed, and prices went up naturally in obedience to the law of supply and demand. There are those who say we overdid the prosperity business and created too much demand and prices have become too high. It is hard to satisfy some people.

The Republican Party is now committed to the policy of fixing duties on competitive commodities only high enough to cover the difference in cost of production here and abroad, allowing a reasonable profit to the American producer. It believes in the creation of a tariff commission to ascertain that difference with practical certainty. It believes in adequate protection to legitimate American producers on the one hand and protection of the American consumer against unjust exactions by monopolistic combinations on the other hand. Its great, patriotic leader, President Taft, initiated this historic measure through his negotiations with the Canadian Government. He recommends its enactment by Congress because it is in harmony with the industrial policy of the country and the best traditions of the Republican Party.

Mr. Chairman, these two countries are neighbors. Their people are of the same race, they speak the same language, they have similar traditions and institutions. They are both capable, self-governing peoples devoted to liberty and order. The long land boundary separating them, several thousand miles in extent, is marked by no frowning forts, is guarded by no standing armies. The placid bosom of the great inland seas which are the common property of both countries, is vexed by no battleships or armed cruisers. Gentlemen, this is the most sublime object lesson in the world's history, teaching us it does, that two intelligent, self-reliant, progressive peoples, may live side by side under different flags, with nothing to safeguard their relations but the spirit of justice and fraternity. [Applause.] Let us consecrate that relation, let us strengthen the bond of unity between these peoples, so that we under the Stars and Stripes and they under their own national emblem may be one people in all things that make for our common good, and tend to promote the welfare of mankind. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the Canadian reciprocity measure (H. R. 4412) and had come to no resolution thereon.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR PORTO RICO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States (S. Doc. No. 813, 61st Cong., 3d sess.), which was read and, with the accompanying papers, ordered printed and referred to the Committee on Ways and Means:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by section 31 of the act of Congress approved April 12, 1900, entitled "An act temporarily to provide revenue and a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith copies of the acts and resolutions enacted by the Legislative Assembly of Porto Rico during the session beginning January 9 and ending March 9, 1911.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 17, 1911.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. DICKSON of Mississippi for 10 days on account of important business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then, on motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD (at 5 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 18, at 12 o'clock m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of Willis River, Va. (H. Doc. No. 16); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Detroit River, Wyandotte Channel, between Fighting Island and city of Wyandotte, Mich. (H. Doc. No. 17); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Patents was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4125) for the relief of the heirs of Benjamin S. Roberts, and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. RUCKER of Missouri: Resolution (H. Res. 101) to authorize the chairman of the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress to appoint a clerk to said committee; to the Committee on Accounts.

By Mr. HOWARD: Resolution (H. Res. 102) to provide for an investigation of the Post Office Department; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. HAMLIN: Resolution (H. Res. 103) instructing committees to examine affairs of departments; to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ANDERSON of Ohio: A bill (H. R. 5636) granting an increase of pension to James W. Porter; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5637) granting an increase of pension to John B. King; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5638) granting an increase of pension to Elisha L. Larowe; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5639) granting an increase of pension to John Ingerson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5640) granting an increase of pension to Mingo Williams, alias Mingo Hinds; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5641) granting an increase of pension to Samuel D. Might; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5642) granting an increase of pension to William Mereness; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5643) granting an increase of pension to Christian Martin; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5644) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Moon; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5645) granting an increase of pension to John Latham; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5646) granting an increase of pension to James W. Longbon; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5647) granting an increase of pension to John T. Hatch; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5648) granting an increase of pension to Samuel Jackson; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5649) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Schickedantz; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5650) granting an increase of pension to David Rizor; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5651) granting an increase of pension to James M. Reynolds; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5652) granting an increase of pension to Marion Harris; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5653) granting an increase of pension to Hunter Hastings; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5654) granting an increase of pension to Nehemier C. Hilford; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5655) granting an increase of pension to Harrison Williams; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5656) granting an increase of pension to David Vestal; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5657) granting an increase of pension to James Milton Thomas; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5658) granting an increase of pension to Alfred T. Tallman; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5659) granting an increase of pension to Ralph Spring; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5660) granting an increase of pension to Jackson Stouffer; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5661) granting an increase of pension to William G. Shute; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5662) granting an increase of pension to Louis Siples; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5663) granting an increase of pension to William Green; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5664) granting an increase of pension to James M. Francis; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5665) granting an increase of pension to William N. England; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5666) granting an increase of pension to Simon E. De Wolfe; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 18, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., as follows:

Eternal God, our heavenly Father, ever ready to hear and answer the prayers of the faithful, help us to pray and work that we may become factors in the world's great fields of endeavor, workers in Thy vineyards, that we may build for ourselves characters Godlike, in imitation of the world's Exemplar, that Thy kingdom may come, and Thy will be done on earth as in heaven. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CANADIAN RECIPROCITY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4412, the Canadian reciprocity bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Canadian reciprocity bill, with Mr. SHERLEY in the chair.

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I spoke on this subject in the last session of Congress at some length. I have no desire in any sense whatever to make a speech now, but I have some additional facts bearing on the matter which I desire to present, believing that possibly they may be of use in the further progress of this debate.

In discussing the question of reciprocity with Canada in the last session of Congress I tried to show that no harm would come to this country if the terms of the agreement were enacted into law, and that it would be in full accord with the practice of the Republican Party in the past and also with the provisions of the national Republican platform at the present time.

I pointed out—

First. That in every case where we had made reciprocity agreements with other countries the result had been beneficial to both parties.

Second. That the pending agreement was in no sense a general tariff revision, but simply a straightforward business arrangement with a single adjacent country for the reciprocal exchange of such articles as the negotiators of both Governments believed, after most careful consideration, could be made with safety to each other and for the mutual advantage of both, and that the special rates so made had no necessary bearing upon the general tariff relations of either Canada or the United States with the other countries of the world; and Third. That the racial characteristics of the respective peoples and the climatic conditions of the two countries fully justified an entirely different course of action of one toward the other from that which ought to control our relations with the peoples on the other side of the two oceans, where like conditions do not prevail. I laid down the fundamental principle that competition can not exist between the products of two nations except with reference to their exportable surplus, and showed the statistical position of the principal crops of Canada and the United States in this respect.

I think I demonstrated beyond dispute, for no reply has yet been made by anybody to the proposition, that the higher cost of living which now obtains in this country was due to an enormously increased demand for food products and a proportionately decreased productive power on our part, and that this great change, due largely to immigration and a transition from agriculture to manufacturing, had begun on the Atlantic coast and was steadily moving westward until now its influence was effective and controlling in the central West.

I pointed out, also, that the transference of millions upon millions of the food-producing classes from the nations of Europe into the manufacturing industries of this country had made the tendency to a higher cost of living world-wide, and I expressed my sincere belief that the continuation of high prices for food products was inevitable, and that the only possible effect of complete freedom of exchange of all natural products between the United States and Canada would be to temporarily retard the rapid advances and to steady the fluctuations of the prices of the fast-diminishing export surplus of many of the food products of both countries, and that a considerable period of time would be necessary for a permanent readjustment of the present world-wide conditions of the cost of living.

I showed that the land values differed in the different Provinces of Canada as they did in the United States, but that taking all occupied farm lands in the Dominion, the average value was $38.60 per acre, as against a value of $23.38 of all occupied farm lands in the United States.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. HILL. I will yield just for a question. I have only one hour, and I will take it all.

Mr. FERRIS. Where does the gentleman get those figures?

Mr. HILL. I get them, in the first place, from the Census Bureau of the United States, and in the second place from the census bureau of Canada. You will find the one in the Canadian Yearbook. Mr. Durand will give you the figures which he gave to me.

Mr. FERRIS. I only asked for information.

Mr. HILL. I quote now from the report of the Tariff Board of March 1 on that subject, specifying where the main differences are found, for the prices of farm lands are based on the yield per acre and selling price of the product; and that question is a vital one in the problem of the cost of living to all of our people.

I would be glad, if any of you have that report before you, to have you follow me in these quotations. These quotations which I shall read are summaries of the Tariff Board, not isolated extracts of prices across the border line, but the summaries of the whole investigation.

On page 84 of that report the board says:

In the great farming States of Iowa, Indiana, and Illinois the values of farm lands are very much higher than in any of the Canadian Provinces. In Illinois and Iowa they are a little more than twice as high as in Ontario.

The increase of land values between 1900 and 1910 has been marked in both countries. In certain of the Provinces the rate of increase has been higher than in any of the States. The highest rates of increase in the States are found where the highest land values obtain, namely, in Illinois, Indiana, and Iowa. But, on the other hand, Ontario, while reporting the highest Canadian land value, shows the lowest Canadian rate of increase. It is worth noting that Ontario is feeling the competition of western Canada, just as some years ago the eastern part of the United States felt the competition of our western lands.

It is impossible to make any significant comparative study of land values in western Canada and those in the United States. Western Canada is a virgin region; railroad lands have been sold to settlers at low prices and on liberal terms of payment; the Government has given away millions of acres under a liberal homestead law. In Manitoba the value of land per acre is $29, or $7 less than in Minnesota and Michigan; but owing to the recent settlement of Manitoba the rate of increase during the last 10 years is much greater than in those States.

Concerning wages in the wheat-producing sections, I quote from pages 85 and 86, as follows:

In general, it may be said that the wages of experienced season hands (hands employed for a period of seven, seven and a half, or eight months, beginning about April 1) are on the same general level in Manitoba and Minnesota, and also on the same general level in Saskatchewan and North Dakota, and they are higher in the last-named localities than in the two first named. Where North Dakota and Manitoba join each other the wages for season hands are about $5 higher in North Dakota than in Manitoba. The wages of harvest hands are practically the same throughout the two Provinces and the three States included in this investigation, with the exception of certain large farms in the States, where the rate is about 50 cents per day below the prevailing rate on the smaller farms.

So far as production per acre is concerned, the official reports show that of winter wheat, in which we excel, our land produced in 1910, 15.8 bushels per acre, and of spring wheat, in which Canada excels, her land produced 15.5 bushels per acre.

We produced 460,000,000 bushels of winter wheat as against 230,000,000 bushels of spring wheat. Canada produced 16,000,000 bushels of winter wheat and 133,000,000 of spring wheat. These are in round figures in both cases, for I am quoting from memory in this matter.

While these statements of land values, wages, and acreage product show clearly that there can be no appreciable difference in the cost of production, the fact of real importance is found in Tables 9 and 10, on pages 94 and 95, that in both countries, while the aggregate production has increased, the home consumption has increased still more rapidly—the United States exporting 6 per cent of its product in 1910 as against 10 per cent in 1909 and 15 per cent in 1908.

During the last three years of great immigration into Canada not only have its land values increased more rapidly than ours, but its percentage of wheat exports has fallen from 38.84 per cent in 1908 to 36.17 per cent in 1909 and 33.16 per cent in 1910.

I now call attention to the board's summary of other products. On page 107 it says of oats:

The highest American yields per acre, each about 42 bushels, are reported from the border States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and Washington. This yield is not equaled by any of the Canadian Provinces. The next highest yields are those of the great oat States, Illinois and Iowa, each of which produces 39 bushels per acre. This is also the yield of Montana.

The yields of Nova Scotia and Ontario exceed this by about 1 bushel.

The highest American farm prices, 50 and 51 cents, are reported from New Hampshire and Vermont, respectively. The highest Canadian prices, 45 and 49 cents, are reported from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, respectively. Ontario receives 36 cents, as against 42 cents received by the New York farmer. The lowest Canadian price quoted is that of Saskatchewan—28 cents. The lowest American price is that of Iowa—27 cents. It is to be noted that the farm prices of more than half of the oat crop of the United States range from 27 to 35 cents a bushel, and that the farm prices of about the same proportion of the Canadian crop range from 28 to 36 cents.

HAY.

The highest American yield per acre, 1.4 tons, is reported by Montana. Maine, New Hampshire, New York, and Vermont each report a yield of about 1¼ tons per acre. The yields of the great hay States of the Middle West range from 1 ton to a little more than 1½ tons. In Canada the average yields range from 0.87 ton, in Alberta, to a little more than 2 tons on Prince Edward Island.

What is Prince Edward Island? I have been all over it, from one end of it to the other, and the crop of hay is insignificant, compared with the requirements of either Canada or the United States.

Ontario, which produces more hay than New York, reports an average yield per acre of 1.84 tons, as against New York's average yield of 1.32 tons.

The highest American farm price, over $15 per ton, is reported from New Hampshire and Wisconsin. The highest Canadian price, $14.58, is that quoted for Alberta. The Ontario price is $10.21, as against the New York price of $13.70. It should be noted that, owing to crop shortage, American hay prices were unusually high in 1910.

HORSES.

Prices of horses range from $106 to $125 per head in Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and New York. In Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and North Dakota the range is from $111 to $126, and in Montana, Idaho, and Washington from $80 to $108. In eastern Canada prices of horses range from $107 to $139 per head, while in western Canada the range is from $107 to $156. In the great agricultural States of Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa prices range from $120 to $124. In all the Canadian Provinces, except Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, and Nova Scotia, the prices are higher than in any of our States.

As to horses, Canada has no surplus of importance outside of Ontario. The agricultural development of the northwestern Provinces has put prices of work stock and heavy draft teams at a premium in the territory tributary to Winnipeg. During the spring of 1910 it is stated on good authority that not less than 20,000 horses were sold out of Ontario alone for shipment to the market just mentioned, and prospective loss of this trade is giving Ontario some concern at this time. The five Provinces of Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta combined have but 1,863,744 head, as compared with 1,600,000 head now in the State of Iowa alone.

DAIRY COWS (p. 109).

Prices of dairy cows range from $33 to $39 a head in Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and New York. In Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and North Dakota the range is practically the same. In the western border States of Montana, Idaho, and Washington the range is from $41.80 to $46.50. In eastern Canada prices of dairy cows range from $32 to $48 and in western Canada from $39 to $41. The highest Canadian price quoted is $48, in Ontario, as against $46.50 in Montana, the highest American price.

CATTLE AND SWINE (p. 110).

Prices of other cattle vary in the United States from $14.30 a head in Minnesota to $27.40 in Montana, while in Canada the range of prices is from $31 in Saskatchewan to $34 in Ontario.

Prices of swine are slightly higher in Canada than in the United States. In our eastern border States, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, and New York, they range from $10 to $11.10. In the great agricultural States of Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, prices of swine vary very little from those already quoted. In eastern Canada the range of swine prices is from $10 to $13 and in western Canada, from $12 to $13. The highest American price is $11.80 a head in Wisconsin, as against the highest Canadian price of $13 a head, which is quoted for Quebec, Manitoba, and Saskatchewan.

SHEEP (pp. 110, 118).

Prices of sheep are much lower in the United States than in Canada, due to the fact that Ontario specializes on pedigreed flocks as appears later on. In the United States they range from $2.90 per head in Texas to $5.30 in Illinois and Iowa, while in Canada the range is from $4 in Nova Scotia to $7 in Ontario, Manitoba, and Saskatchewan.

While the sheep industry in Canada at the present time is a minor one, the feeding of lambs for market has been an important business in Ontario, as many as 125,000 head having been exported as late as 1907 to the United States and 33,000 the same year to Great Britain. The surplus has now dwindled, however, to such an extent that practically none was received at the Buffalo stockyards during 1910. In fact it is reported that a few American-fed lambs have been shipped from Buffalo to Toronto, indicating that Ontario at the present time is scarcely supplying her own wants in this regard. This is, however, an abnormal condition.

These are the general conclusions drawn by the Tariff Board from their investigations. So far as retail prices in various localities are concerned, comparisons are of no value as a rule, for they are almost always affected by local conditions, such as methods of distribution and business customs. But I call attention to the fact shown on page 128, that new-laid eggs retail at 30 cents per dozen in Burlington and 40 cents in Montreal; that milk sells at 7 cents per quart in Burlington and 9 cents in Montreal; cream at 45 cents per gallon in Burlington and 50 cents in Montreal; and that butter sells at 32 cents per pound in Burlington and 35 cents in Montreal.

I submit herewith also the table found on page 132, giving the prices on dressed meats both at wholesale and retail in Chicago, Toronto, and Montreal, showing in every case higher prices in Canada than in the United States:

Comparative prices of agricultural products, January, 1911—Dressed meats.

WHOLESALE PRICES PER 100 POUNDS.

	Chicago, Ill.	Toronto, Canada.	Montreal, Canada.
No. 1 beef carcass	$9.50	$9.50	$9.50-$10.75

This investigation and report of the Tariff Board, published since I spoke in February on this question, fully justifies the claim I then made, that the treaty was in strict accord with the Republican national platform declaring that "the true measure of protection is the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad."

Over and over again since this treaty was made public the reduction in the price of wheat has been quoted as proof that the coming of reciprocity was casting its shadow before, and some Members on this floor wore into shreds and tatters telegrams tending to prove that wheat would soon become almost valueless, because Canadian restrictions were not taken off from logs and pulp wood to be manufactured on this side of the boundary at what has always been claimed to be a higher cost of production. As a proof that the law of supply and demand is still in operation, I quote from the market reports of the New York Tribune of March 27 concerning wheat:

Exports of wheat and corn are growing, and as the price of flour has reached an export basis, increased shipments may be looked for. The visible supply of wheat in the United States is 10,000,000 bushels more than at this time last year, while the world's supply is 30,000,000 bushels larger, the two factors, with favorable prospects for big crops in the current year, apparently precluding the possibility of a return of quotations to the high levels of 12 months ago.

I also quote a dispatch from Chicago, published in the New York Journal of Commerce, with reference to barley:

BARLEY HITS RECORD HIGH LEVEL.

CHICAGO, March 23.—Barley made an entirely new price record in Chicago to-day. Up to $1.13 a bushel was paid. The rise to-day reached 2 to 4 cents, making a total gain of more than 20 cents in the last couple of weeks. Scarcity of the grain has developed sharp competition between malsters and brought about a boom excelling anything of the kind previously known in the trade.

Is it not manifest that if the proposition for reciprocal trade in these commodities is responsible for these changes, it is working both ways at the same time?

But that is not all, for it is claimed by some gentlemen here that the policy of reciprocity in competitive products is not only a wrong economic one, but that it is "un-Republican" and "ruinous to the protective system." And yet only two years ago the bituminous coal interests of Pennsylvania petitioned the Ways and Means Committee for complete reciprocity with Canada in one of the great products of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois—bituminous coal—and every Republican on this floor who voted for the Payne bill as it passed the House was guilty of this heresy to Republican principles, for if it is a heresy now, it was just as much so then.

But agricultural implements, which are also competitive products and essential to farming, furnish a still more glaring inconsistency. Our Democratic friends have just reported a bill which will be acted upon in a few days putting these things on the free list, and yet every one of them who voted against the Payne bill voted against not only Canadian but world-wide reciprocity then, and our Republican friends who voted for the tariff bill and now oppose reciprocity with Canada in other competitive articles will have much difficulty in adjusting their conscientious scruples, for paragraph 468 of the Payne bill puts plows, tooth and disk harrows, harvesters, reapers, agricultural drills and planters, mowers, horse rakes, cultivators, thrashing machines, and cotton gins on the free list from any country in the world which will admit ours free.

If any American farmer chooses to pay a higher price for any of these things than he can buy it for at home and so put himself on a parity with the Canadian farmer, he can get them to-day in England, as the Canadian does, and import them here absolutely free of duty.

The only trouble is he can buy them cheaper at home, and so far as these things are concerned the proposed Democratic bill will be of no benefit to him.

It is only fair to state that this challenge to a world-wide reciprocity in the Payne bill was flung out to all nations at the request of the manufacturers themselves. I defy any Republican or Democrat to gainsay that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HILL. Yes; I will yield—if the interruption is short—for a question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman inform us whether or not agricultural implements are produced in Canada?

Mr. HILL. Oh, yes; a few; but I guess not so many as we send over there.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman give us a comparison of wages paid in that industry in Canada and the United States?

Mr. HILL. There is no difference between the wages paid in Canada and the United States. I will stand upon that.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him just a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER]?

Mr. HILL. I can not yield. Of course there are different rates of wages. One employer will pay liberal wages, while another will squeeze the life out of his employees. But in a general way I will state that there is no difference in the wages between like people, living in a like climate, under similar conditions.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But the gentleman has just stated that in some respects the cost of living is higher in Canada than in the United States. If the wage earner has to pay a higher cost of living, is not that an important factor in considering his situation when his wages are the same?

Mr. HILL. Yes; I will answer the gentleman, and say that the cost of living is higher in eastern Canada than in South Dakota.

Now, I commend to the gentleman the next sentence that I am going to read: "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." The opponents of Canadian reciprocity may not see the force of this interjection, but they will if they study their Bibles and familiarize themselves with Paul's experience in Ephesus. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HILL. I can not yield. I have only a few minutes more.

The site of the former Temple of Diana, which I visited three years ago, is now nothing but a great mudhole, and that also is suggestive of many things. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Nor can our Democratic friends congratulate themselves that they are walking now in the paths which their fathers trod, for most of these food products which will come in free under reciprocity with Canada were dutiable at an average of 20 per cent in the Democratic Wilson bill and at from 40 to 20 per cent in the Walker bill of 1846; and about the only thing found in the infinitesimal free list of that still sacred achievement of Democratic revenue legislation among the many made free in this bill are shrubs, seeds, and fish.

Now, if you ask me my idea of protection to a farm product I will give you an illustration. Canada produces about 73,000,000 bushels of potatoes per annum; the United States about 336,000,000 bushels annually. The production is under like circumstances in both countries and in like climatic conditions. Indeed, in many cases the boundary line runs right through the potato fields. The freights to the great markets of this country are substantially the same. I have them here, given me by the Interstate Commerce Commission, by rail and by the Hamburg-American and North German Lloyd steamship companies from Germany, yesterday, by telegraph:

Railroad rates on potatoes, carload lots, to New York.

From—	Cents.
St. Paul, Minneapolis, Oshkosh, Manitowoc, Green Bay, Wis.; Escanaba, Bagley, Mich.....per bushel	21.68
Fredericton, St. Johns, Morrison, New Brunswick...do	15.53
Caribou, Daggett, Presque Isle, Me.....do	17.87
Houlton, Me.....do	15.53
Van Buren, Me.....do	17.58
Ashland, Me.....do	16.99
Greenville, Me.....do	14.65
Hamburg and Bremen, Germany, by steamer.....do	9.80

The freights to the great markets of this country are substantially the same. Whatever difference there is, possibly 1 cent a bushel, is in our favor. No duty is needed from Canada, because there is no difference in the cost of production. But across the ocean is a country of small area, with a population of 60,000,000 people—Germany—which produced last year 1,800,000,000 bushels of potatoes, six times as many as we did with our 30,000,000 more population. With the cheap labor of Germany, she can do it at an average cost of at least 10 cents a bushel less than we can. More than that, Germany can put those potatoes into New York City by water at a freight of 5 cents a bushel less than the rail rate from any producing points in the United States. I would ascertain, through a careful investigation by the Tariff Board, what the average difference in the cost of production is and would make a duty to fully cover it. That is my idea of protection. That is the competition from which I would protect the American farmer, and that is Republican protection, as I understand it.

The fact of the case is that Canadian reciprocity is not in any sense a tariff question, and I am profoundly glad, gentlemen, that it is not a party one [applause], for it has been negotiated by a great Republican President and, in my judgment, will receive the approval of a majority of both parties on the floor of this House. [Applause.] In its very essence—and I shall discuss it from this point hereafter—it is a question of the future cost of living in this country, and that problem vitally affects every individual in the land. It goes into every home, not only, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS] said, the home on the farm, but into the tenement house as well, into the humble cottage of the poor and the palace of the rich likewise. It is as insistent and compelling in the great city as in the country village, and it demands the anxious thought of every nation on this new continent, as it has already become the despair of every nation on the old one.

Three years ago I visited a great factory in Berlin, and was shown through it by an intelligent foreman who could speak a little English. "What do you pay for meat here," said I, "roasting and boiling pieces?" "Meat! Workmen know no meat. Potato and cabbage, cabbage and potato," was his reply. And I understood the significance of a country of 60,000,000 people raising 1,800,000,000 bushels of potatoes every year. "What is the price of butter?" I asked. "No butter can buy. Oil," he answered.

I have traveled for a month in the Orient, with an educated, cultivated gentleman as a guide, and his continuous diet was boiled rice, with a little dried fish added on feast days only.

Half of the population of the world to-day are struggling for a bare existence, and I never want to see on this continent such a civilization as that kind of sustenance compels.

The political complexion of Great Britain to-day is determined by the size of a loaf of bread, and the socialism of France and Germany is in reality a protest against scanty nourishment and the inability of the masses to obtain those things which make life tolerable and give to men ambition and hope of better things in the future for themselves and those dependent on them.

The increased cost of living was the dominant factor in the last election in this country, and mistaken as I think the people were as to the underlying causes of higher prices, they were not mistaken in the fact of their existence, for they were faced with the proof of it every day.

They did not stop to think that every year a million immigrants are added to our population beside its natural increase. They did not realize that eight-tenths of these settled in the manufacturing and mining sections, and that in the last decade nearly 10,000,000 of people, most of whom were food producers across the ocean were changed to food consumers here, and, besides that, the cities were growing enormously at the expense of the farming sections, making more food consumers and less food producers still.

They saw the splendid development of the West and the prosperity of the South and wondered at the resulting conditions as they were affected by them, forgetting the fundamental fact that no matter how much supply may increase, if demand increases more rapidly still, prices are bound to advance in proportion; and so they voiced their protest at the polls, and you gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber are now politically responsible for a situation which a Republican system of taxation did not cause, and which a Democratic system can not change, for increased demand for food products pressing upon the same area of production is certain to advance the price of the product and the increased return on the investment means higher land values, which in turn compels higher cost of production in the future. There can be no remedy except in a larger area of production or a reduced standard of living which will lessen demand.

In the last Congress I set forth in some detail the change from agricultural to industrial conditions in the States east of Indiana, and I call further attention now to the increase of manufacturing in the South and the limitation of the productive power of that section to the single crop of cotton, and I am satisfied that the present census of the United States will show that, with possibly two or three exceptions, the States east of the Mississippi River are nowhere near self-sustaining so far as food products are concerned.

In the two decades from 1880 to 1900, while this great industrial change was going on in the Eastern States, the value of all farm property in New Hampshire, Vermont, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Ohio decreased to the amount of $325,800,779, and in the same decades the value of all farm property in Indiana, Illinois, Nebraska, Kansas, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Missouri increased $4,773,031,222. The addition to the wealth of those great States was enormous, and yet it can be easily accounted for by the fact that in a previous generation the value of much of that land had been merely nominal and had come into the possession of the owners at very low prices, much of it by the payment simply of the homestead fee of $1.25 an acre and that the increment was the result of long and hard struggles in subjecting it to cultivation, and with the low prices then prevailing securing the improvements which now make life enjoyable to the present possessors.

But the new census will show a wholly different condition of affairs. The natural movement to higher prices which a constantly increasing demand has caused, while it has affected all agricultural sections throughout the country, has given to these great cereal-producing States of the Central West by the greatly increased prices of their products an added wealth in increased land values which I do not believe has been equaled in any like period of time and in any similar territorial area in the history of the world.

In making this second comparison, I have not been able to get the census returns of the State of Ohio, but I have no doubt that State has shared in the results of these changes in equal proportion with the neighboring Eastern States of New York and Pennsylvania as it did before.

I will insert in the RECORD the changes in the land values alone, not including buildings and live stock, in order to show the added wealth of agricultural investments in the East and West in the single decade of 1900 and 1910. During that time the States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania show an increased value of land alone in the sum of $328,515,000, thus practically bringing them back to conditions which obtained 30 years, ago, and substantially recouping the previous loss.

Eastern States—increase of land value, 1900 to 1910, farm land alone.

	Value.	Gain.	Per cent.
Maine	$85,923,000	$36,569,000	74
New Hampshire	44,327,000	8,828,000	25
Vermont	58,255,000	12,441,000	27
Massachusetts	104,273,000	17,348,000	20
Rhode Island	14,837,000	1,415,000	11
Connecticut	71,527,000	19,086,000	36
New York	703,214,000	152,040,000	28
Pennsylvania	627,185,000	51,792,000	9
New Jersey	122,357,000	28,996,000	31
Total	1,831,898,000	328,515,000	.....

Over against this increase I call attention to the remarkable showing of the eight States of the Middle West—Illinois, Indiana, Nebraska, Kansas, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Missouri—which in this single decade, now existing as settled communities, and with conditions in no way arduous and burdensome as those which had prevailed in their previous history, find themselves now in the possession of an investment increased, so far as land value alone is concerned, in the sum of $7,140,534,000.

Western States—increase of land values, 1900 to 1910, farm land alone.

	Value.	Gain.	Per cent.
Illinois	$3,061,584,000	$1,567,450,000	104
Indiana	1,825,475,000	637,842,000	93
Nebraska	1,613,077,000	1,126,471,000	231
Kansas	1,534,552,000	1,002,364,000	188
Iowa	2,709,025,000	1,542,273,000	122.7
Wisconsin	591,032,000	60,489,000	11
Minnesota	1,016,889,000	467,587,000	82
Missouri	1,441,529,000	746,058,000	103
	13,403,143,000	7,140,534,000

In addition there was an increase of buildings and farm implements of $1,584,837,000.

The entire increase in the manufacturing industries of the whole United States for the first half of this decade, as shown by the census of 1905, was $3,707,440,473, so that it is fair to assume that in addition to a means of livelihood, and over and above the accumulations of live stock this 10-year period has given to the agricultural population of these eight States an increment of land value and buildings far greater than shown by the entire manufacturing industries of the whole United States for the same period. Note the added value of the farm lands of a single State like Illinois, aggregating as it does $1,566,450,000, an increase of 104 per cent, or 9 per cent annual addition to the investment over and above good dividends every year. Indiana shows 93 per cent; Nebraska, 231 per cent; Kansas, 188 per cent; Iowa, 122 per cent; Wisconsin, 11 per cent; Minnesota, 82 per cent; Missouri, 103 per cent. What that means to Illinois, the third manufacturing State in the Union, is shown by the fact that it is more than double the entire investment of that State in manufacturing, at the beginning of this 10-year period, and that the increase in manufacturing capital during the first 5 years on which we have the census figures was less than one-third of the value added to farm lands alone.

Now, I do not cite these figures with any feeling of envy or anything else but sincere rejoicing at the great prosperity which has come to this section of our common country, and by no vote or act of mine would I knowingly or willingly do anything which would detract from it. The men of the West have built up great empires there which have added to the glory of the whole land and to the prosperity of every section of it, and I am thoroughly confident that their present achievements, great as they are, are but promises of a still more glorious future.

But in this great industrial change which is surely coming to them, as it has already come to Ohio and the East, a new basis of cost of production of food products of the land must in the very nature of things be reckoned with, and it is hardly fair in looking into the future to say that the present movement is an attack upon the farming industry, in view of the fact that these enormous additions to the agricultural wealth of the country have been the result of the irresistible movement toward higher prices, which have affected all alike, but which have been far from being equally distributed in the respective industries. I call attention to the statements made in the United States Crop Reporter for January, 1911, which, I think, will be somewhat of a surprise to many people in this country, especially those who have been in receipt of sundry and various circulars with which the country has been flooded during the last two months, some of them anonymous and some of them bearing the imprint of the agricultural associations of the country. This governmental report shows an average increase in the money return per acre in the United States of the crops of corn, wheat, oats, barley, rye, buckwheat, potatoes, hay, tobacco, and cotton in 1909 of 72.7 per cent over and above the like return per acre in 1899, the unit increase on corn being 96.7; wheat, 69.5; oats, 62.7; barley, 37; rye, 44.8; buckwheat, 25.5; potatoes, 40.7; hay, 46.1; tobacco, 53; and cotton, 92.

On the other hand, the same documents will show as bearing on this all-important question of the cost of living that the department made at the same time that the other figures were tabulated a comparative statement of the prices of 85 articles purchased by farmers in 1909 and 1899, and in explanation of both tables I submit the conclusions drawn by Mr. Victor H. Olmstead, chief of the bureau, who says:

> From the foregoing data it appears that whereas the acre of the farmers' crops of 1909 was 72.7 per cent more than in 1899, and the cost of the articles purchased by them increased about 12.1 per cent, the purchasing power of the produce of 1 acre in 1909 was about 54 per cent greater than the purchasing power of the product of 1 acre in 1899. An acre of corn having increased 78.6 per cent, its purchasing power increased 60 per cent. An acre of wheat having increased 114 per cent, its purchasing power has increased 91 per cent, and an acre of cotton having increased 65.6 per cent, its purchasing power has increased 48 per cent.

I commend these tables in the Crop Reporter of January, 1911, to your consideration.

Under these circumstances it hardly seems to me that the circulars to which I have referred have fairly stated the situation to the farmer. I do not think that this was intentionally done, nor do I think that many of the other statements made in these circulars were intended to be misleading, although that is unquestionably the fact. For example, I find in one of them a statement as follows:

> The farmers receive much less protection than the manufacturers, for, while farm products are taxed on the average of about 25 per cent, manufactured articles are taxed on the average of about 45 per cent—

clearly showing an effort to convince the agricultural community that manufacturers as a distinct class are specially favored in the tariff law, and this I emphatically deny. I do not now wish to argue the question as to whether the export products of the soil are the direct recipients of the benefits of the protective system or not, but I will publish as a part of my remarks a table showing the ad valorem equivalent of the duty on 47 of the principal articles produced on the farms in the various sections of this country, and I make the assertion now, that if wool, tobacco, and sugar were classified as farm products in the agricultural schedule, as they should be, that schedule would show a higher rate of duty than any other schedule in the Payne tariff bill, except wines and spirits.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut yield?

Mr. HILL. I have not the time. If I have time when I get through, I will answer any questions.

Some duties in the agricultural schedule, applying Payne rates to 10 years' importations, 1898 to 1907.

N. Sundries	14.21

And sundries, or Schedule N, includes a greater volume of importations than any other two schedules put together.

I cite these figures also as a clear and distinct reply to another statement in one of these circulars, which says:

> We hold that the farmer should receive exactly the same measure of protection as is given the manufacturers, and that there must be no reduction of duties on farm products, either by reciprocity or tariff revision, unless the duties on all manufactured articles are at the same time correspondingly reduced.

I find this same theory of the protective system set forth in a circular issued by the Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas, in which it is claimed by the residents of that overwhelmingly Democratic State that import duties, whether levied as a protective tariff or as a tariff for revenue, or on any other basis, should be so levied that their industries would receive an equal share in whatever benefit may flow therefrom.

Now, this is a theory of protection which is entirely new to me, for I had supposed that the whole system was based on an equalization of differing costs of production in this and other countries, and hence, where no difference exists, no duty would be collected; but this claim would suggest a wholly different idea—that hereafter it is to be a system of favoritism shown by a bountiful Government to all of its people on a basis of share and share alike. My suggestion is that no greater inequalities in effective duties will be found anywhere in the law than in the rates in the agricultural schedule which I have heretofore cited, and that the adoption of such a new system as an exact equalization of them would wholly do away with the necessity in the future of the services of a Tariff Board and would make the enactment of such tariff law an easy task, for it would consist of but one single rate applicable to all importations. I do not think that such a claim needs further consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McCALL. I will yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. HILL. No people on earth will render a more unbiased judgment on any great question of this kind than the intelligent and thoughtful people of the United States, and I am sure that time only is needed to correct the mistake which, in my judgment, was made last fall in giving to the Democratic Party the control of the future revenue system of the country.

I have spoken of the necessity of reckoning with the new basis of investment in estimating the cost of food products in this country in the future, and I now call attention to a most remarkable confirmation of my fears, found in a speech made by a Senator from a wheat-producing State, and which has come to me through the regular mail, and from which I have, therefore, no hesitation in quoting. I refer to a speech made by Senator GRONNA, of North Dakota, on February 28, 1911. He says:

> We do not now produce all the wheat of which we are capable. There is still land left which will produce wheat, and although this land, or much of it, will not grow wheat profitably with low prices, it will produce a large amount of wheat if the owners are assured that the price will remain high enough to make it profitable. This applies not only to land which is at present owned by private individuals, but also to considerable public land still remaining. Most of the increase in our wheat production, however, must come from increased yields rather than from increase of acreage. More intensive cultivation will increase the yield per acre, and with the increase in price which will follow the overtaking of our production by our consumption such intensive cultivation will be brought about. If the tariff on wheat is removed, however, such improved cultivation of our wheat lands will be delayed. Agriculture is an industry of diminishing returns; after a certain point in cultivation of land has been reached, although additional cultivation will increase the yield, each additional unit of crop so produced will cost more in capital and labor expended than did the preceding units. Consequently those additional units will not be produced until the price received for the product has reached such a point that it will be profitable to expend this additional amount of capital and labor in producing them. With our markets thrown open to Canadian wheat, the production of which is less expensive than that of most American wheat, the price will be prevented by the Canadian wheat from reaching the level making it profitable to raise the additional bushels per acre.

I ask the thoughtful consideration of Members of this House in both parties to this plain proposition thus clearly stated that no action should be taken by the Congress which should in any way even temporarily retard the increase in the cost of production of this greatest of all food products, an increase which the Senator candidly admits to be inevitable in the future.

If the claim was made that no harm should be done to land investments honestly and laboriously acquired, as practically all of the tillable public lands of the United States have been, until no more now remain for homesteading, and that prices of wheat should be maintained to give a liberal return on such investments now with a fair chance of future increment, I should admit that the claim was just and reasonable, whatever I might think of the possibilities of such legislation. But I do not believe that the people of this country will deliberately enter upon any course of action which they know in advance will for all time continually increase their cost of living, until they are forced to it by conditions from which there is no possibility of escape.

Assuming present prices for both lumber and wheat to at least continue, and probably to advance, as I believe they must, yet I can see no more justification for free lumber from Canada for the Northwestern States than I can for free wheat from Canada for the rest of the country.

All through those States the demand is insistent for the extension of the area of forest products to take in all of Canada and give us her lumber and logs and pulp wood free of duty and other restrictions. The demand is justified on the ground of conservation of material resources.

I stand for the same extension of food production and plead the conservation of human life as at least equally entitled to your consideration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The speech I have quoted demands the development of unprofitable areas here and the intensive cultivation of our own soil, and it is admitted that both can be secured only at a higher cost of food to the masses of the people. I stand for complete freedom of trade with Canada, if need be, to retard the advances in food products, which all concede must come.

The Senator from North Dakota pleads for dollars, I plead for humanity. Not for the rich; they can take care of themselves; but for the poor and the needy, in the years to come. Not for the manufacturer, but for the wage earner; not for the great landowner, but for the day laborers upon the farms and in the mines, and for the plain people of the land in every section, East and West, North and South—the men who carry the burdens in time of peace and fight our battles in war. [Applause.]

Within the natural lifetime of your children and mine, yes, of one-third of the people now living, these United States will have a population of 200,000,000 souls.

The opportunity is ours to provide for their welfare now.

The meat products of this great Nation, and a once possible competition from the Argentine Republic, are already controlled by a few great capitalists. I will not, in face of increasing prices for cereals, vote to limit the God-given possibilities of this whole continent and so subject those who shall come after us to a like monopoly in grain, let the consequences be what they may. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he will consume some of his time.

Mr. DALZELL. What time did the last gentleman occupy?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania on his side has used 4 hours and 41 minutes, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] has used 2 hours and 15 minutes, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] 4 hours and 12 minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. How much time did the last speaker occupy?

The CHAIRMAN. He occupied 1 hour and 10 minutes, which is included in the statement just made.

Mr. McCALL. I think the Chair has stated a greater amount of time than was yielded.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield 1 hour in the first instance and 10 minutes in the second.

Mr. McCALL. Yes; but yesterday I yielded only an hour, which was not all occupied.

The CHAIRMAN. On yesterday the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] used an hour and five minutes. To-day the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] has used 1 hour and 10 minutes, making a total of 2 hours and 15 minutes.

Mr. McCALL. I think the Chair is mistaken, but I accept the statement of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the record at the desk.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] one hour. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, the President condensed the scope of this proposition into a single sentence in his message of January 26 last, when he said:

> Reciprocity with Canada must necessarily be chiefly confined in its effect on the cost of living to food and forest products.

That is, reciprocity with Canada so called will have little or no effect on manufactured products, but will be "confined in its effect" to farm and forest products.

So far as lumber is concerned, I voted for free lumber, when the Payne bill was under consideration, and we would have had free lumber if Democrats representing timber interests had not prevented it.

This agreement proposes, first, a free list of farm and some other products.

Second, a conditional arrangement as to pulp and print paper.

Third, it proposes an arrangement for the mutual protection of the manufactured products of both Canada and the United States on terms agreed upon, subject to Canada's preferential arrangement with certain foreign nations.

Both Canada and the United States are protection countries, both have prospered under protection, and both propose to continue to protect their factories upon an agreed basis, but they mutually agree that the agricultural products of both may enter the markets of either duty free.

CANADA'S WHEAT AREA.

Let us consider the farmers' relation to this transaction. Let us consider it, Democrats and Republicans, so far as possible, in a nonpartisan way.

Canada has a population of about 8,000,000 and an area of about 4,000,000 square miles. Of that area about 2,000,000 square miles lie within the so-called unorganized Northwest Territories, which reach from Labrador to Yukon and from Ontario to the polar regions.

To the south of the western sweep of the Unorganized Territories lie the organized Territories of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta. Manitoba has an area of about 74,000 square miles, about the size of North Dakota. Saskatchewan has an area of about 250,000 square miles. Alberta has an area of about 253,000 square miles; and each is almost big enough to hold North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Illinois, and Michigan combined. It can not be definitely stated, but there is probably more wheat land in Canada lying west of the Red River of the North than there is in the United States west of the Mississippi, and the Canadian wheat land yields an average of 22 bushels to the acre, while the wheat land of the United States yields an average of 15 bushels to the acre.

The most authoritative statement I have been able to obtain as to the wheat-growing area of Canada is contained in an article contributed to the August, 1910, number of a periodical called Science, by Prof. M. A. Carlton, cerealist in the Agricultural Department.

The article is called "The future wheat supply of the United States." I will read a part of it:

A careful study of the conditions in Canada reveals a possibility in increased production far ahead of any other present exporting country. Outside of Manitoba, wheat production has only fairly begun, and yet the entire production can be made as large as that of the United States at present.

The undeveloped resources of Alberta and Saskatchewan are very great. These two Provinces and Manitoba are of chief present importance in grain production. The available farm area of the two larger Provinces, based upon reports of provincial officials, is about 250,000,000 acres out of a total land area of 310,000,000 acres. This farm land would furnish a similar proportion for wheat as now employed in Minnesota and Kansas, or about one-ninth of the area. This should be particularly capable of attainment because of the impossibility of any considerable corn production. One-ninth of this farm area will furnish a wheat area of almost 28,000,000 acres. Manitoba employs now almost 3,000,000 acres. A conservative estimate therefore may be made in round numbers of 30,000,000 acres as the possible wheat acreage for these three Provinces in 1950.

The present average yield per acre of both spring and winter wheat for the three Provinces, calculated from previous 10-year records, appears to be about 22 bushels, which should increase to at least 25 bushels. This rate of yield would allow a total annual production of 750,000,000 bushels, of which over 600,000,000 bushels would be an increase over present production. This possibility leaves out the increases that will occur in older Provinces and the probable production in northeastern British Columbia and the Northwest Territory.

A possibility of wheat cultivation, even in northern Alberta, is not a matter of theory, but has been fully tested. In the year 1908, 35,000 bushels of wheat were already grown in the vicinity of Fort Vermilion, at an average yield of 24 bushels per acre. Two stone mills and a modern roller mill are established at this point, which is 350 miles north of Edmonton. The wheat grown is probably not the best, but appears to be of fair quality and has a fine appearance.

DAMAGED BUT NOT INJURED.

It is proposed by this trade agreement to permit millers and shippers to buy wheat on both sides of the international boundary line free of tariff interference.

Now, it will scarcely be claimed by anybody that the American farmer will be benefited by the free importation of Canadian farm products into the United States in competition with his own. But it is claimed that things which the farmer sells will be bought cheaper, and since things which the farmer sells will be bought cheaper, it follows that it is deliberately intended that the farmer shall be compelled to sell cheaper; and the means whereby it is deliberately intended that the farmer shall be compelled to sell cheaper is Canadian competition, to be created by this agreement.

But we are told that in some way, not involving the reduction of the middleman's profit, the people who live in large cities will be permitted to buy things cheaper, and the farmer will be compelled to sell things cheaper, but that the farmer will suffer no injury by reason thereof.

We are told that wheat will overrun from Canada into the United States and that the American farmer will have to take less for his wheat, but that he will be all the better off. [Laughter.]

We are told that bread will be cheaper, and the only man of all the 35,000,000 engaged in "gainful occupations" in this country required to contribute to that result is the farmer, and the farmer is expected to enjoy it. [Laughter.]

We are further told that in order to facilitate this agricultural contribution system wheat should be free and flour protected at the rate of 50 cents a barrel.

Now, the purpose of this agreement in its relation to the miller is made perfectly clear on page 28 of Senate Document 862, which I think I have a perfect right to call an inspired document, inasmuch as I think it is generally understood that it was prepared by one of the commissioners who negotiated this treaty. On page 28 it says:

The millers will be enabled to regain in large part the enormous losses they have suffered in recent years with respect to their foreign sales.

Excellent! But who is going to recoup the farmer for recouping the miller [laughter and applause] and enabling the baker and the packer and the brewer to make large profits out of the consumer?

It is said the millers are to recoup themselves for "enormous losses." That means, of course, that the millers must make enormous gains, because they are to recoup themselves for "enormous losses." And how are the millers to recoup themselves? Obviously, out of the farmer on the one hand and the consumer of bread on the other hand.

LOOKING AT THINGS FROM A HIGH PLANE.

Inasmuch, however, as we are "linked together by race, language, and geographical proximity," and because Canada has never cost us anything for gunboats or military equipment, the President invites the farmer to look at this thing "from a high plane" [laughter] and to recognize the equity and breadth of international comity of an arrangement that will injure him financially, require him to divide his home market with Canada, and sell the balance of his crop abroad subject to the toll of the miller and the shipper.

Gentlemen, the farmer would be able to view this transaction from a higher plane if his view were not obstructed by the discrimination against him and in favor of the miller of 50 cents a barrel on flour, while his wheat is made free in the interest of cheaper food.

The farmer would be able to see this transaction from a higher plane if his view were not obstructed by the discrimination against him and in favor of the brewer by a duty of 45 cents a hundred on barley malt, made from barley which the brewer is permitted to buy of the farmer free, in the interest of cheaper food.

The farmer would be able to view this transaction from a higher plane if his view was not obstructed by a discrimination against him and in favor of the packer of a cent and a quarter a pound on dressed meat cut from the carcasses of animals which the packer is permitted to buy of the farmer free in the interest of cheaper food. [Applause on the Republican side.]

HOW LIVERPOOL "FIXES" THE PRICE.

In order to see this thing from a high plane, we are invited to consider that Liverpool fixes the price of wheat anyway; but, on page 27 of this inspired document, we are told that "the price of wheat in the United States generally averages, as to the northwestern crop, fully 10 cents per bushel and sometimes so much as 15 cents per bushel higher than in the corresponding sections of Canada."

Does Liverpool "fix" it that way, and if Liverpool "fixes" it that way, what has the duty got to do with it anyway?

Of course if Liverpool fixes it that way, the duty would make no difference, and if the duty makes no difference, there would be no reason for removing the duty.

This Liverpool-price idea has been in circulation so long that a great many people accept it without reasoning upon it; but Liverpool does not "fix" the price. The price does not stay "fixed." It never did stay fixed. Gentlemen around on this floor here in debate for the last two days have been quoting all sorts of simultaneous prices. The price fluctuates from day to day. It goes up with the report of an unseasonable frost, and it goes down with the report of a timely rain.

But the farmer is invited to welcome Canadian crops and to market his own abroad. If Liverpool is a good market for us, why is it not a good market for Canada? Besides, Canada is "linked" with Liverpool "by race, language," and political institutions. Now, if this is not a better market than Liverpool, why should Canada want it? [Applause on the Republican side.] And if it is a better market than Liverpool, why should we give it to Canada? [Applause on the Republican side.]

THE FARMERS' WELFARE VITAL TO THE WELFARE OF THE COUNTRY.

Gentlemen, for years we have been telling the farmer that his welfare was vital to the welfare of the whole country, have we not, Democrats and Republicans alike? For years we have been telling the farmer that the prosperity of the country depends in a great measure upon the prosperity of agriculture.

Were we hypocrites when we told him that, or was it true? And if it was true, and it was, is it any less true now than it was in 1908, when we told him that last?

While yet the grain fields of Canada were unplowed we told the farmer that while protection to his grain was of little value, protection as a policy was of immense value to him, because it built up a market at his door, and now that he is beginning to receive some benefit from direct protection shall we take it away from him while leaving every other class protected?

While yet the grain fields of Canada were unplowed we told the farmer that the more people there are employed in factories the bigger the town; that the bigger the town the better the market for the farmer, and that the better the market for the farmer the more valuable the farm.

We told him that the more people there are employed in the factories the more people there are to buy what the farmer grows to sell, and that the more people there are to buy what the farmer grows to sell the more the farmer gets for what he grows to sell.

We told him the more the farmer sells of what he grows to sell the more the farmer buys of what the manufacturer makes to sell, and we told him the more the manufacturer sells of what he makes to sell the more men he employs to make more goods to sell to everybody; and the more men there are employed to make more goods to sell to everybody the more money they have to buy of everybody.

We told the farmer that men out of work buy less and less at the store, and that when men out of work buy less and less at the store the store buys less and less of the wholesaler, and the wholesaler buys less and less of the factory, and the railroad hauls less and less to everybody and for everybody.

We told him that the more men there are out of work the less money there is in use and circulation, and that the less money there is in use and circulation the lower the price of everything.

And this is all eternally true; but manufacturing New England, which is as much indebted to protection as any part of the Union, wants a special dispensation in her own behalf [applause and laughter on Republican side], so that she can buy food of the Canadian farmer free and at the same time be permitted to go on selling her protected manufactured products to the unprotected farmer of the West. [Applause on the Republican side.] How broad, how generous, how altruistic, how characteristic! [Prolonged applause and laughter on Republican side.]

My friend Cushman, now dead, once applied an old story to New England, and invited her to let go of the tariff teat or quit kicking the cow. She is likely to do both if this thing goes through. [Applause and laughter on Republican side.] There are a great many people west of the Hudson. [Laughter.]

Gentlemen talk about low prices. The quickest and surest way to get low prices and hard times and industrial rust and cobwebs and industrial stagnation, and empty dinner pails and smokeless chimneys, and wheels that stand still while the unused current sweeps by is just to turn the management of business over to the political successor of the architects of the Wilson bill. [Applause on the Republican side.] Then the consumer will be able to buy things cheap. But, gentlemen, the bun in the grocery window is never more remote than when you have not a nickel to buy it with. [Applause on the Republican side.]

BUILDING ROADS AND BRIDGES FOR CANADIAN COMPETITORS.

Now that we have built up here on American soil a market of $25,000,000,000, with trade tributary to it traveling over our own rivers, lakes, and railroads—and we are proud of it as Republicans, because it has been built up under Republican policies—it is now proposed to invite Canada in to participate with us and compel our farmers to seek a foreign market.

For years it has been our theory that inasmuch as the foreigner contributes nothing for the maintenance of our schools, churches, roads, bridges, and internal improvements, he ought to be required to go down in his pocket and produce something to contribute to our tariff fund for the privilege of selling here. Now, it is proposed to compel the farmer to tax himself to build roads and bridges for the convenience of his Canadian competitors to travel over and compete with him in our markets. [Applause on the Republican side.]

CLASS DISCRIMINATION.

Lately we have been congratulating the farmer on the fact that he is receiving just fair prices for what he has to sell, and it is the first time for years that we have been able to do that. But whatever the American farmer plants from this time on he must plant on shares with Canada. [Applause on the Republican side.]

This agreement, stripped of all verbiage, is a proposition to cheapen American farm products. By it it is proposed that the farmer shall receive less, in order that the people who live in large cities may pay less.

Let us consider this. We have a population here of about 92,000,000, and of that population about 35,000,000 are engaged in so-called gainful occupations. Of these 35,000,000 engaged in so-called gainful occupations about 12,500,000 are engaged in agriculture, about 8,500,000 in manufacturing and mechanical pursuits, about 6,000,000 in trade and transportation, and about 8,500,000 in professional and domestic service, and we are all interdependent.

For years we have argued that you could not strike a blow at any one of these industrial divisions without striking a blow at our whole industrial system, and it is true. But by this you propose to levy upon the farmer for contribution to all the rest. Is it fair to levy upon one industrial class for the benefit of all the rest?

"EQUAL RIGHTS FOR ALL; SPECIAL PRIVILEGES TO NONE."

Some years ago somebody paraphrased a statement made by Thomas Jefferson in his first inaugural message into the expression, "Equal rights for all and special privileges to none," and Democrats have been quoting it ever since under the mistaken impression that they were quoting Thomas Jefferson. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Is it "equal rights for all; special privileges to none" to protect every other industrial interest in this country and leave the farmer exposed to competition?

Is it "equal rights for all; special privileges to none" to remove protection from the farmer's wheat and protect the miller at the rate of 50 cents a barrel on the flour he makes of the wheat he buys of the farmer free?

Is it "equal rights for all; special privileges to none" to remove protection from the farmer's oats and protect the manufacturer at the rate of 50 cents a hundred pounds on the oatmeal and rolled oats he makes out of the oats he buys of the farmer free?

Is it "equal rights for all; special privileges to none" to remove protection from the farmer's barley and protect the brewer at the rate of 45 cents a hundred in the interest of cheaper food?

Is it "equal rights for all; special privileges to none" to remove protection from the farmer's cattle, sheep, hogs, and "all other live animals," and protect the beef trust at the rate of a cent and a quarter a pound on dressed meats cut from carcasses of the cattle, sheep, hogs, and "other live animals" it buys of the farmer free?

Is it "equal rights for all; special privileges to none" to protect the distiller at the rate of $2.60 a gallon on whisky made out of rye which he is permitted to buy from the farmer free in the interest of cheaper food? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Is the proposition to protect every large industrial division and leave the farmer exposed to competition "equal rights for all; special privileges to none"?

You southern gentlemen: Suppose Canada grew cotton, how many of you would oppose protected cotton; and if Canada grew cotton and there was a protective tariff on cotton, would you be in favor of taking the duty off cotton; and if Canada grew cotton and there was a protective tariff on cotton, would you gentlemen be in favor of removing the duty from the planters' cotton and permitting the New England manufacturer to be protected in the fabrics he would make from the cotton he bought of the planter free?

How would that square with your theory of "equal rights for all; special privileges to none"—on paper? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

The line of discrimination runs through this transaction as straight as a gun barrel, and you Democrats are going out of your way to help to perpetrate it.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] the other day talked about fooling the American farmer. Well, I reckon that the farmers of North Carolina are a heap easier fooled than the farmers of Michigan. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The farmer of Michigan understood the drift of this transaction instantly.

You gentlemen hope to carry the next election. Do you expect the aid of the farmer? I admit he is going to be between the devil and the deep sea.

You can not make loose change of the American farmer in your dickers with foreign nations or in your schemes for political power without the farmer finding it out. We have the free rural mail delivery nowadays.

Gentlemen, I would not be at all surprised to discover that this special session will become known in the next campaign and known in history as the "antifarmer session." [Applause on the Republican side.] And, my Democratic brethren, your relations to it will be a good deal like that of the man who drew an elephant in a raffle. [Laughter.]

THE FARMER'S PATRIOTISM.

Gentlemen, the American farmer is patriotic. From the days when the "embattled farmer fired the shot heard 'round the world" at Concord he has been fighting the battles of the Republic. Half clad, half fed, and poorly armed, through cold and privation, sometimes with bleeding feet, he followed Washington to Yorktown and to victory.

The first time the American flag, Mr. Chairman, ever challenged an enemy or inspired a patriot in battle he followed it at the Brandywine and he has been following it ever since.

Its stripes are red with the blood of patriots shed that its stars might shine together, and farmers' blood has helped to dye it red. [Applause.]

He has built his home upon the frontier, and sometimes in the silence and stillness of the forest he has listened for the tramp, tramp of coming millions. And as soon as the advance guard has arrived he has built the American schoolhouse and hoisted the Stars and Stripes above it.

The American farmer is patriotic. If it were necessary to make a sacrifice for the good of his country, he would do it again and again as he has done it before, even to the last supreme sacrifice of his life.

FAIR PLAY.

But, Mr. Chairman, the American farmer, like every other manly man, likes fair play. He likes it in your country just as he likes it in mine. Even the intermediate dealer, when he takes his rake-off out of this assessment of the American farmer, will scarcely respect himself the more for taking it, or his Government the more for giving him the chance to take it. [Applause.]

Why, gentlemen, if it were proposed to levy exclusive contributions upon them the newspapers of this country would break out in scare heads and double-leaded editorials immediately. But the great metropolitan dailies of the country, to whom is being held out the hope of future benefits, view the somewhat hopeless and inarticulate efforts of the farmer to avert this injury to him with a tolerant and languid interest.

If the railroads were to be specifically assessed for the benefit of every other industrial class in this country, they would cut down wages, lay off labor, and lay off trains. But Mr. James Hill's railroads run into the wheat fields of Canada, I understand, and Mr. Hill and his fellow haulers are content.

If it were proposed specifically to assess labor and capital and manufactures for the benefit of all the other industrial classes, this Capitol would be besieged. And yet the farmer is expected to take his loss and smile, smile, and keep on smiling. Well, gentlemen, he may not smile much right now, but he has been studying the meaning of reciprocity, and he will know how to reciprocate. [Laughter.] He has been studying discrimination, and he will know how to discriminate—in November, 1912. [Applause on the Republican side.]

THE FARMER COMPELLED TO SELL LOW AND BUY HIGH.

The reason for this discrimination against the farmer is said to be the high price of food.

Times are good and prices are high, and good times and high prices generally go together, and bad times and low prices generally go together. When times are good they are good for everybody, and when they are bad they are bad for everybody.

We all like high prices, but we like them for what we have to sell; and we all like low prices, but we like them for what we have to buy. We all like high prices and we all like low prices—Democrats and Republicans—but we like them when they are coming our way. But this is the first time in the history of our country when it has been deliberately advocated as a policy that one great industrial class of our population should be required to both buy high and sell low for the benefit of the other industrial classes.

What are the causes of high prices? One cause, by common consent of scientific investigators, is defined by the so-called quantitative theory of money.

That theory imagines that the commodities of the world are in one pile. It imagines that the money of the world is in another pile, and it balances the money of the world against the commodities of the world, and as money increases in quantity in its relation to commodities it is correspondingly decreased in value in its relation to commodities. Therefore it takes more money to buy commodities, and therefore more money makes higher prices. That is the so-called quantitative theory of money.

Fifteen years ago the annual production of gold the world over was $202,000,000. In 1910 it was $454,000,000. Prices are up the world over—up in Europe, up in South Africa, up in China and Japan, up in South America, up in the United States, and up in Canada.

Where there is a universal condition it is reasonable to look for a universal cause, and the increased production of gold is said to be that cause.

THE LAW OF SUPPLY AND DEMAND AS AFFECTED BY MONOPOLY.

With universal high prices caused by the increase of money in its relation to commodities other causes may conspire. For illustration, the law of supply and demand.

The law of supply and demand may operate normally, it may be affected by monopolistic methods, or it may be affected by sociological conditions.

But, Mr. Chairman, this is the first time that this Nation has ever proposed, directly or indirectly, to recognize and, by implication, to sanction monopolistic methods.

The millers of Canada and the United States are protected from the rest of the world, first, by geographical location, and, second, by the tariff laws of their respective countries.

By this agreement they are given free range of the wheat fields. Themselves being the only American market for wheat, and themselves being the only American producers of flour, they can within certain limits fix the price of wheat when it goes into their mills, and fix the price of flour when it comes out of their mills.

They know that as a rule the farmer is obliged to sell soon after harvest to save storage, shrinkage, and wastage and to stop interest on his mortgages. They will give him the opportunity of selling at their price then or later on.

When wheat goes into their mills they control the flour and bread market of North America, and they participate in the control of the world's supply of wheat.

Minneapolis, the milling center of the universe, is on this side of the line and dictates terms to lesser mills.

On the other side, according to Senate Document No. 862, there are now in operation mills at Fort William, Winnipeg, and Keewatin, with a capacity of from 4,000 to 10,000 barrels daily. One Montreal concern, with a chain of mills from Montreal to Winnipeg, claims to be the largest millers in the British Empire, with a daily capacity of 17,500 barrels; another, with offices at Montreal and Winnipeg, is making 10,500 barrels of flour daily; another, whose head office is Toronto, with mills at Winnipeg, Goderich, and Brandon, claims a daily capacity of 7,000 barrels.

Knowing the modern tendency of corporations to organize themselves into combinations, it is difficult to believe that these strong Canadian milling companies have not an understanding among themselves as to prices.

Knowing the methods of corporate combinations, it is impossible to believe that "the largest millers in the British Empire" would permit small competitors to grind long except on terms agreed upon.

Knowing the modern method of international trade combinations, it is difficult to believe that the milling center of the universe on this side of the line and the "largest millers in the British Empire" on the other side of the line do not understand one another.

They themselves are a part of the so-called Liverpool market, because through them and their cooperators the surplus finds its way abroad subject to their toll. To assume that these milling companies have not taken advantage of this opportunity, and to assume that they will not continue to take advantage of this opportunity, is to assume that the millenium has arrived in the milling business, and of this we have no evidence.

Human nature is selfish, and it is never less selfish when organized into corporations; and corporations are never less selfish when organized into trusts.

EXPROPRIATION.

I said a moment ago that the law of supply and demand might be affected by sociological conditions.

There has been a constant movement of our population from the country into the cities. Fifty per cent of our population has become congested in the great cities of this country, and the undisguised purpose of this arrangement is to require farmers to furnish cheaper food to the people who live in large cities.

Such a thing as to select one grand division of our industrial life for compulsory contribution to all the rest has never been done before.

Now, setting aside the question of the justice or the injustice of this proposition in a government of supposed equal rights for all and special privileges to none, would this "expropriation"—to adopt a socialistic term—of the proceeds of the farmer's toil for the benefit of the people engaged in manufacturing and mechanical pursuits, for the benefit of the people engaged in trade and transportation, for the benefit of the people engaged in professional and domestic service, accomplish the results expected?

This means that twelve and a half million people engaged in agriculture are to be levied upon for the benefit of the other 80,000,000, among whom are organized colossal corporate combinations which have challenged the attention of the world and contested the power of courts and legislatures to control them.

The Minneapolis price of wheat from January, 1910, to January, 1911, inclusive, ranged from 10 to 16 cents higher than the Winnipeg price.

It is a scientific fact that when two fluid bodies standing at different levels flow together, they tend to reach a state of equilibrium at a common level.

Imagine two ponds of equal size, one 10 feet higher than the other, separated by a narrow neck of land. Remove the barrier and the higher pond will fall and the lower pond will rise until they are exactly at the same height.

Apply this to the wheat areas of Canada and the United States. It is clear that the price of wheat will range lower in the United States and higher in Canada, by reason of this agreement, and that a price equilibrium will be reached. Who will get the benefit of it? It is certain that the farmer will lose it—that is foreordained by this agreement—but who will get the benefit of it?

If the people who live in the great cities will not get the benefit of it, then this agreement is utterly indefensible from any standpoint.

THE EVOLUTION OF A LOAF OF BREAD.

From the best information I have been able to obtain, about 72 per cent of a bushel of wheat becomes flour and about 28 per cent becomes shorts and bran. It takes, on an average, a trifle less than 5 bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour, depending on the character of the season and the quality of the wheat. The wholesale millers' price of a barrel of flour ranges from $5.50 to $6.50 per barrel, and the price of bran ranges from $22 to $26 a ton. Bakers buy flour at jobbing prices, close to the millers' wholesale prices.

A bushel of wheat, according to the best estimates I can get, and I have gone to scientific sources to obtain this information, will make 60 loaves of bread as bread is commonly baked in this country.

I know it was stated in the Senate that it would make 75 loaves, but I looked that up and I am satisfied that the Senator was wrong when he made that statement. Now, assuming that the farmer will lose 10 cents a bushel—and the less he loses the less the consumer will be benefited, of course—divide 10 cents a bushel by 60 loaves, do you suppose that the consumer of a loaf will get the benefit of that one-sixth of 1 cent after the bushel of wheat has traveled from the wheat field to the table of the consumer?

Suppose the farmer loses 5 cents a bushel, and divide 5 cents by 60 loaves. Do you suppose the consumer will get the benefit of that one-twelfth of 1 cent?

Follow the bushel of wheat from the wheat fields to the miller, from the miller to the baker, and from the baker to the consumer.

I assume that before that bushel of wheat has become 60 loaves of bread it has first been sold to a wheat buyer, who gets his percentage for handling. Next, it has been stored in an elevator, which gets its percentage for storing. Next, it has been carried, say, to Minneapolis by a railroad, which gets its percentage for hauling.

Next it has been sold to a miller, who converts it into flour and makes his profit for handling and grinding, and in addition to that he has taken out the bran and shorts.

Next the flour has been sold by the miller to a wholesaler, who makes his profit for handling.

Next it has been carried by a railroad, which gets its percentage for hauling.

Next it has passed into the hands of a wholesale baker, who transforms it into 60 loaves of bread and makes his profit for baking.

The loaves have been hauled by a railroad, which gets its percentage for hauling, and they have been handled by a retail grocer, who gets his profit for handling.

The wholesale bakers in big cities ship these loaves along the lines of railroads radiating from the big cities; they go to the little towns along the way, and there the retailers sell them to their customers for 5 cents a loaf.

By the time that bushel of wheat has traveled from the wheat fields of the Dakotas or from Saskatchewan, or wherever it comes from, to the table of the consumer of bread it has paid storage, rent, clerk hire, delivery service, miller's wages, baker's wages, miller's profits, baker's profits, wholesaler's profits, retailer's profits, and railroad, telegraph, and telephone service. Do you suppose the intermediate dealers and handlers along the way from the wheat fields to the ultimate consumer will not absorb the one-sixth or the one-twelfth of 1 cent per loaf? Do you suppose the ultimate consumer is going to get the benefit of that? Certainly not.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of South Dakota. Of course the gentleman has not overlooked the fact that it is doubly provided that he shall not, from the fact that on 4½ bushels of wheat a reduction of 10 cents represents 50 cents, and that is retained on the flour as soon as the miller makes it in Minneapolis.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Precisely.

There is a vast difference between the modern machine-made porous openwork loaf and the bread made by the farmer's wife from the flour made from the wheat that the farmer hauled to the local mill; and there is a vast difference between the mill of to-day and the mill of a few years ago, and there is a vast difference between the population to which the mill was tributary a few years ago and the population to which the modern mill is tributary.

Wheat fluctuates from day to day in the markets, but the price of the commercial loaf never fluctuates.

All that fluctuates is the amount of bread in the loaf, and that fluctuates surreptitiously, and generally fluctuates downward.

Wheat has fallen off in price since this agreement was promulgated.

The farmers are thousands of dollars poorer by reason of it, but not a loaf has been bought cheaper by reason of it, and not an ounce has been added to the loaf.

It is unnecessary to follow the course of a bushel of oats or a bushel of rye from the field to the consumer, or to follow the course of a bushel of barley from the field to the vat of the brewer. The general result of loss to the farmer, no gain to the consumer, and profit to the middleman is the same.

FARM PRICES AND PULLMAN PRICES.

Now, I want to tell a little personal experience. I have the old farm where I was brought up. You gentlemen of the South call it a plantation. I think more of that old farm than any place on earth. I had a law practice when I came to Congress, but I have not any left. I have the old farm left.

Mr. MURDOCK. Good! [Laughter.]

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. And I am going to keep it unless the sheriff gets it away from me at the end of some of these political campaigns. [Laughter.] Now, a year ago last November my tenant came to me and said, "We have some potatoes to sell." I said, "What can we get for them?" He said, "Twenty-six cents a bushel. They have got to be culled and selected in order to bring that." He said the local market was glutted, but some one was buying for shipment. I said "All right, we might as well sell them." The price did not really pay for the cost of growing and handling. We got 26 cents, less the cost of hauling and handling.

The next day I took the train to come to Washington. I went into the dining car to get my dinner—you call it dinner here, but we call it supper in my country, and I like the name better. I think it tastes better.

I ordered a baked potato and a steak. The steak was $1.25 and I paid 15 cents for that baked potato, more than half of what I got for a bushel of my potatoes the day before. [Laughter.] These are Pullman prices and they are hotel prices, and the same difference between the price to the producer and the price to the consumer ranges all the way down from porterhouse to "chuck steak."

Let me tell you another thing. On the 12th of March I had a letter from a constituent in Allegan County, Mich. He said, "Just think of it; the President says prices are high, with wheat at 85 cents a bushel, eggs at 14 cents a dozen, and potatoes at 25 cents a bushel, and other commodities in proportion." That is within 150 miles of Chicago.

Do you think it is quite fair to assess the men who get these prices for the benefit of all the rest of us, my Democratic brethren? Do you think you are doing a just and patriotic thing? By and by, if you are not careful, it may possibly react on you. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

There are some people who are never satisfied unless they pay more than a thing is worth. They never think they are getting a good thing unless they pay more than it is worth, and the dealer always knows his customer and is ready to accommodate him. [Laughter.]

There is another class of sycophants who can not afford it, but who are always happy to pay a high price for anything they eat or drink or wear, providing they can eat it or drink it or wear it in the upper regions of the financially select.

They are always known, because the dollar always knows its kin by instinct, but they would rather be patronized than not to be present.

There is another class, who live in the regions of too much, where the Pullman car is a connecting link between establishments called homes, where every tick of the clock ticks cost.

There is another class of loafers, parasites, criminals, and others who get rotten before they get ripe. [Laughter.] These people do not need our sympathy and are not entitled to it, but the people who are working for low wages, and low salaries, do need our sympathy, and they ought to have it, and they do have it, and the supreme argument for a protective tariff is that it does protect American labor from the cheap labor of Europe and the Orient.

John Mitchell, in his book on Organized Labor, says:

> The American people should not sacrifice the future of the working classes in order to improve the condition of the inhabitants of Europe.

And he is right. Neither should we sacrifice the farming classes in order to improve the condition of the inhabitants of Canada. The argument is as good for the farmers as it is for the laborers. [Applause.]

THE MOVEMENT FROM COUNTRY TO CITY.

Why has our population been shifting from the country to the city?

One reason is that people work 16 hours a day on the farm and they work 8 hours in town. Another reason is to earn more money. Why, gentlemen, if the farmer is so rich that he ought to be assessed for the benefit of the rest of us, why have his children left the farm?

Another reason is that young men and young women are lured by the glitter and glare and show of the city, and think they will have greater advantages there, but after they get there they find the pavements are hard and monotonous, that rents are high, that food is high, that most people are rated according to their bank account, and that it is more than a hundred miles between the fashionable and unfashionable sides of a brick wall. [Applause.]

I was reading a few days ago a report of a commission appointed in the city of New York on Congestion of Population, and that commission says that in the Borough of Manhattan—and I hope some Representative from the Borough of Manhattan is here—there is a block where the density of population is 1,260 to the acre.

That means a space 6 feet square—a little bigger than a grave—for a human being to eat and sleep and live and die in. Piled up there 10 stories high in those tenements whole families live sometimes in two rooms and take boarders.

That is bad for the health of a community, bad for the morals of a community. Not only are the tenements in these districts crowded, but the streets are crowded.

In his book on Housing Reform, Mr. Lawrence Veiller shows that conditions in New York are without parallel in the civilized world, and he says:

> In no other city are there the same appalling conditions with regard to lack of light and air in the homes of the poor.

The death rate of children ranges from 60 to 92 to the thousand. This congestion breeds crime and disease and poisons the body politic. It causes increasing rents and lower wages.

One-twentieth of the assessed valuation of the Borough of Manhattan is said to be owned by eight families, estates, and corporations. The commission reports that—

> Low wages, high rent, increase of land value, and the cost of construction and labor all seem to work in a vicious circle, the effect of which is indirectly to increase congestion and lower the standards of life in the congested districts.

There are other cities in this country where congestion committees might find conditions to report upon.

Mr. Chairman, this is going on while in the country outside of the smoking, steaming piles of city masonry, where people are stacked up, story above story, there are thousands of acres of land where homes of cleanliness and comfort, pence and plenty await the industry of intelligent agriculture. Do we need to annex Canada? [Applause.]

The Socialist can find no better argument for overturning our present social and political system than right here in the congested districts of New York.

But, after all, why destroy the whole system? Why not reform New York?

The question of whether government of the people and by the people will be able to continue to govern itself is no longer a far-off question, but is here and we are already in the midst of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, there is something more to be done, gentlemen, than to legislate against farmers in the hope that some vestige of what the farmer loses may run the gantlet of intermediate greed and reach these poor people who live in these congested districts.

And one thing to be done is to reform your educational systems, so that city boys and girls may be fitted for something else than city life.

Another thing is to stop crowding your factories into your city blocks, thereby crowding neighboring tenements with laborers who want to be near their work.

Another thing is to keep them nearer the ground, and not to herd helpless employees in city lofts without adequate fire escapes. Such a condition is only little less than barbarous. Every one of these city fires emphasizes the fact that by a certain quality of commercial mind commerce is considered of more importance than human life.

Another thing is in some way to limit the monopoly of land holding which enables a few landlords to collect dividends from squalor, vice, and misery.

THE TESTIMONY OF THE SECRETARY OF AGRICULTURE.

But they tell us the farmer is rich and can afford to be made an exception of, while trusts are undisturbed. Read Secretary Wilson's report for 1910. He shows you that the farmer does not get 50 per cent of the price the consumer pays for agricultural products.

That was before the exigencies of Cabinet service made it necessary for him to modify some of the views that he had before expressed [applause and laughter on the Republican side], and he goes on to say that if the farmer has lately been getting just a little better price for what he has to sell, it is due him for all the years of hardship that he has gone through.

Some of us who have lived a little closer to the farms than some of you city men know something about this, and I say to you that I never encountered a public question since I have been here that touched my heart and conscience like this question has, and I would rather go out of Congress than to stand for it. [Applause on the Republican side.] But I will not have to do it. [Renewed applause.]

He tells us that down to recent times—

> The prices of farm products received by farmers were even less than the cost of production and often little, if any, above the cost of production.

In commenting upon the recent advance in farm products he says:

> That this should have been so was merely a matter of justice to the farmer to equalize the reward of his efforts with the rewards received in other lines of production.

After showing that by a careful, scientific, and exhaustive investigation he has found that the middleman gets over 50 per cent of the price charged the consumer, and in many instances a great deal more, he closes this branch of his report with the statement that—

> From the details that have been presented with regard to the increase of the prices of farm products between the farmer and consumer the conclusion is inevitable that the consumer has no well-grounded complaint against the farmer for the price he pays. The farmer supplies the capital for production and takes the risk of losses; his crops are at the mercy of drought and flood and heat and frost, to say nothing of noxious insects and blighting diseases. He supplies hard, exacting, unremitting labor. A degree and range of information and intelligence are demanded by agriculture which are hardly equaled in any other occupation.

AUTOMOBILES.

But some one has heard that out in Kansas some farmers own automobiles.

Well, one thing is fairly certain, that when a farmer owns an automobile he has not mortgaged the place to buy it, as many a city parvenu has done.

In 1908 the correspondent of the New York Post thought it was of sufficient importance to telegraph the news across the continent both ways that a circus was in town and that a farmer had been seen following a circus with his family in an automobile.

Why, gentlemen, it was not many years ago that the farmer did not have money enough to buy a ticket to a circus. It was not many years ago that he was selling hogs for $3 a hundred; it was not many years ago that he was burning corn for fuel. It was not many years ago that he was reading Coin's Financial School [laughter] and figuring how he could make 50 cents worth of silver legal tender in payment of past-due debts.

Now he is considered so well off that you, my Democratic brethren, want to assess him for the benefit of the rest of us. [Applause.]

BAD POLICY.

This proposition, in my judgment, is bad industrial policy and bad political policy. It is bad industrial policy because it is bad to discriminate among industrial classes. It is bad political policy because it introduces this trade agreement into an orderly course of procedure which was being evolved by the Republican Party to provide for the levying of duties which should "equal the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad." That policy proposes an upward limit on duties. Why? To prevent domestic monopolies from overcharging domestic consumers. It proposes a downward limit. Why? To protect American labor from the cheap labor of Europe and the Orient and to maintain the standard of American citizenship.

The first step in that orderly course of procedure was the creation of a Tariff Board for the scientific ascertainment of that difference.

The next step was the report of this ascertainment by the Tariff Board to be used by the Ways and Means Committee for checking and comparison of the testimony of interested witnesses. The next step was the framing of such ascertainment and testimony into law. The effect of this irrelevant, inconsistent, and unfair agreement, in my judgment, will be to indefinitely postpone the execution of this policy.

Gentlemen, I am in favor of reciprocity, but I want reciprocity between the farm and the factory, reciprocity between cotton and corn, reciprocity between the North and the South, reciprocity between the East and the West—reciprocity among ourselves. I do not want reciprocity that will compel the farmer to plant on shares with Canada and market his surplus abroad. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I feel somewhat reluctant to follow two such distinguished speakers on the other side, but my diffidence would be more acute if it were not for the fact that one of them is traveling in one direction and one in the other, both on the same side of the House and of the same political faith. To my mind, as I have been able to study this Canadian reciprocity treaty in my primitive way and in my simple way, for I am not a tariff expert, this contract, or compact, between Canada and this Union of States is nothing more than a simple agreement where each makes some concessions and each will receive mutual benefits. I do not claim that all of the advantages are on the side of the States, nor do I share the belief of the alarmists and the inspired articles—partly inspired by patriotism and, I am informed, partly by cash—that say this agreement when adopted will heap disaster upon us and play havoc with us all.

REDUCES 600 SCHEDULES AND INCREASES NONE.

It deals with approximately 600 of the schedules, and every one of them are either reduced to the free list or reduced from the Payne-Aldrich tariff rate and not a single increase of a single schedule. This compact or treaty places 41 paragraphs of the Payne bill that are now on the dutiable list on the free list and makes marked reductions of the present rate on 59 paragraphs. The compact is so arranged that it does not interfere with any future arrangement of our tariff laws, and it is full of good, wholesome provisions for our people generally.

WHO ARE PARTIES TO THIS TREATY.

Let us pause for a moment and see who the contracting parties to this agreement are. On the one hand the United States, with her 92,000,000 people, who have increased in population in the last 10 years 21 per cent, and as the other party to this contract we have Canada, with her approximately 7,000,000 people, who have increased in population in the last 7 years approximately 33 per cent.

SOME GOOD REASONS WHY TREATY SHOULD BE ADOPTED.

Further, we find that along our northern border we join Canada for a distance of more than 3,000 miles, and the conditions of the people and the country are not essentially different in any respect.

We find the two people speaking the same language, bound together by ties of marriage and blood. We find 600,000 of our Americans residing within their borders, and we find 1,500,000 of the Canadians residing within the States. We find the two peoples carrying on the same business endeavors; we find them with the same hopes and aspirations; and I can not think that two countries where the conditions are so nearly identical should longer be separated by any imaginary line. [Applause.] Speaking for myself, I can not but think that we should have absolute free trade between two such countries the same as we have it between the sister States of the Union. [Applause.]

WILL NOT REDUCE PRICE OF LAND.

We find it charged in the inspired farmers' journals—some inspired by patriotism and some, I am informed, by cash—that this treaty if adopted will reduce the price of land in the States; but such can not be true from any precedent we have to blaze the way. For as we have seen the golden West settled reservation by reservation and State by State, we have likewise seen the price of land both in front and behind the tide of western empire increase in price fifty, yea, one and two hundred per cent. We find by consulting the statistics on this very interesting question that of the occupied land in Canada the average price per acre is approximately $38 per acre, while the average price of the occupied land of the United States is but approximately $23 per acre. It has been called to our attention that the price of land in Minnesota, one of our northern border States, and in Manitoba, one of the border provincial States just opposite, was at variance to the amount of $10 per acre. I am not here to dispute those figures, but am here to dispute the fact that they prove that land is either more or less valuable in Canada than it is in the United States, for, as all of us have often observed, prices vary more than that right in adjoining States, and often without apparent cause. In my own State of Oklahoma, on the Oklahoma side of Red River the land is worth from $20 to $40 per acre, while on the Texas side of the river, in the State of Texas, approximately if not quite the same lands can be had for from 25 to 50 per cent less. It is often caused by press dispatches—abnormal and speculative values built up by booms given it by railroad and real-estate promoters. I think it is safe to say the value of lands in Canada and in the United States of like kind and character are essentially the same in price; so the scarecrows erected by the protectionists and high-tariff adherents are again not trustworthy. It at least is no occasion for alarm and no reason why the treaty which we have before us should not become a law and thereby reduce the exorbitant burdens of the Payne-Aldrich law that was so recently by the people universally repudiated.

WILL NOT REDUCE WAGE SCALE, BUT WILL STIMULATE WAGES.

Again it is asserted by the inspired journals and the protectionists that it will destroy our high-wage scale for the American laborer. Again we find that the wage scale in Canada is essentially the same as in the United States, and, if anything, is a little higher. Instances can be cited where it is higher in the States, and like instances can be cited where it is higher in Canada, usually if not quite always due to the fact that some local condition is playing an active part rather than by reason of any tariff cause, either directly or indirectly. The opposition to the pact on this ground is but the careworn expression or ghost head that the protectionists always drag out when they hope to defeat any reduction in the tariff whatever. They always call to their assistance the tender sympathies possessed by all for laborer to accomplish their own selfish ends.

No one on this side of the Chamber would be a party to any reduction of the wage scale for the American laborer, for, in my judgment, he is not at present being paid too much. [Applause.] No one on this side of the Chamber would be a party to the dragging down of labor in any form, for it is the willing hands that toil that is the very hope of the Republic and the pride of us all. [Applause.] The exception we take is of having the high protectionists make the laboring men carry the load for their high protection schemes when the laboring man gets none of the profit or glory. Labor and her offspring has too long borne the brunt of selfish manufacturers, monopolists, and trusts, and it should not longer prevail or be allowed to endure.

WILL NOT BE DETRIMENTAL TO FARMERS' INTERESTS.

It is charged by certain high-tariff oracles by word of mouth and in print that the enactment of this pact means the reduction of the American farmer to the very dregs. My reply to that charge is that I do not believe it in theory or in fact. I came of a race of farmers, and I love as well to-day as then the traditions of those industrious, good people, and if I did believe it I would fight and vote against it as often as it appeared for passage.

Again, it is asserted that it is unfair on its face; that it does not portray the first principles of fairness. My answer to this is I do not believe it; on the contrary, it seems to me that the burdens and virtues are quite well distributed between the two countries. It does not in places go as far as I would prefer, but it is a long step in the right direction, and it is my cheerful prediction that the American people will be glad we gave it to them after they really understand what it does for them.

TREATY PLACES LUMBER ON FREE LIST.

In the treaty the United States gets free rough lumber, and the beneficial results that flow from this provision are almost unnecessary of dilation or explanation. Only last year with a sky-high tariff on lumber we imported into the United States from Canada more than the sum of $19,000,000 worth of boards and deals, let alone the $7,000,000 additional for lumber of other denominations. I ask you high protectionists who are opposing this treaty, Will that do the American home builder of the broad prairies good or harm? Will that help the courageous pioneer to subdue the West? Will it not be beneficial to every citizen in all the land save the Lumber Trust? I ask you if the Lumber Trust is expected to lend its hearty support to any treaty which metes out to it tardy justice that has long been delayed by the aid of Representatives who are here in one form and another championing their cause? I ask you if it is any wonder that we find articles in many of the purchasable papers inspired by cash denouncing the pact as unfair and one-sided? It has even been charged, and by men of intelligence, that free lumber would do no good to the home builder, but these figures on a moment's thought belie themselves when we find the amount of lumber imported from there to build homes with, even though bearing an unconscionable duty, to be more than $19,000,000 in a single year.

We have seen the home builders and the pioneers of the West too long struggling beneath their too heavy load in their efforts to erect a little shelter over their heads. We have sat here complacently and seen lumber in 1908 sell at an average price of $11.08 per thousand, and in 1909 we have seen the same lumber sell for an average price of $15.37, and have seen it go up in price each day since that time. We have seen the forests of the country being reduced to underbrush and cut-over lands. We have seen timber lands all held by a few lumber barons while the American people have gone homeless and roofless. We have seen the forests of the country denuded and made bare with no corresponding good effect to the people who build the homes and carry on civilization. This one provision of the treaty will help every home builder in the land. This one provision will beget the respect of all the people who are not financially interested, and they should not be heard to longer defeat plain competition on a subject so vital to all of our people.

REDUCTION ON SHINGLES FROM 50 TO 30 CENTS PER THOUSAND.

Again, we observe that the Payne duty of 50 cents per thousand on shingles has been by this pact reduced to 30 cents. It has even been asserted that this provision would not avail the home builder anything, but this can not be true, for only last year we imported from Canada $1,759,000 worth of shingles to cover our very heads from the sunshine and the rain. Shingles, in my judgment, should go on the free list and remain there, and if we had Democrats in power at both ends of the Capitol, I imagine they would go there; but if we can not get what we want, is it not right to do the next best thing and take the best reduction we can get with a Republican President and Republican Senate to deal with? I can not think this logic is bad. I believe it will be acceptable to the people of this country when they have time to digest and find out the articles they have been reading are inspired not alone by patriotism, but mostly by high tariff campaign managers and cash. [Applause.]

REDUCTION ON LATHS FROM 20 TO 10 CENTS.

The Payne rate of duty on laths to use in plastering our houses is by this pact reduced from 20 to 10 cents. It cuts the rate in half. Some one may say that does not amount to anything, but, my friends, it does, for only last year we imported from Canada into our own United States the sum of $1,802,000 worth of laths.

BARB WIRE ON FREE LIST.

This treaty puts barb wire on the free list. This commodity is used extensively for fencing throughout the length and breadth of the country, and our farmers will appreciate this duty provision, I am sure. It is true that the Steel and Iron Trust may not want the change, and we find the gentleman from Pittsburg [Mr. DALZELL], in charge of the time, yielding it only to Members of this House who are opposed to this bill. We challenge not his right, but we submit it is quite a frank thing for him to do to come here on the floor of this House and oppose this pact on the ground that it is detrimental to the farmers. We can not but wonder if he is not most concerned about the farmer that farms the steel mills in the heart of Pittsburg. His presence in opposition to this bill and his well-known tariff views speak louder of his real views than any open declaration he could make.

WOOD PULP ON FREE LIST.

This pact puts on the free list wood pulp and pulp wood from which print paper is made, of which there was imported into the United States from Canada last year in pulp wood $6,389,553, in cord and wood pulp $3,021,347, to the end that knowledge may be more cheaply and freely disseminated. It places the father in a better position to buy schoolbooks for his children, or will enable him to educate them now, where heretofore he could educate them but partially. It places books and magazines within more easy reach of both rich and poor. It is a step in the right direction and well worthy of the efforts sought in bringing it about.

NEW ENGLAND PAPER TRUST PROTEST.

It is true that we have on our desks of this date and for each preceding day since this session began protests from the Paper Trust of New England, but we must legislate for all as distinguished from the few. We must not maintain monopoly and break down competition when the intellectual advancement of our people are at stake. We must not sit here and allow the few New England selfish paper trusts to fatten at the expense of the many when it strikes at the intelligence and the advancement intellectually of our very Republic. I believe none other than parties directly interested have assaulted the wisdom of the reduction of this schedule. It is so self-evident and so patent to all that this step should now be taken, and it is but tardy justice to the great press of the country, who have more to do with the molding of public opinion than any other agency within our land to-day. I say it is with delight that this schedule is swept away and is now taking its place on the free list. I can not but think the authors of the Payne bill must feel ashamed at their failure to enact it when they were in power and the Payne bill became a law at the last Congress. It played no small part in their retirement at the polls last year, and it will play some part in keeping them retired if they receive their just rebuke.

COTTONSEED OIL ON THE FREE LIST.

This treaty puts cottonseed oil on the free list, and this can not be said to be unfair to the American cotton planter. On the contrary, it is a great help and stimulus to him, for it will open a new field and a new market without any competition whatever, for as all are aware cotton is not raised in that latitude. This will mean much to the cotton section, and the cotton farmer will have gratitude in his heart, for his new and widened market made possible by the enactment of this righteous provision in his behalf.

SALT ON FREE LIST.

It places salt on the free list. This will help the stock raisers of this country and will be of slight benefit to us all, and no one can say it is not in the interest of the citizens of the United States to remove from them the grasp, at least partially, of the Salt Trust.

FISH ON FREE LIST.

It puts fish on the free list, and only last year we purchased $49,000,000 worth of fish, so this will be of help to us and no possible harm to us. It will afford a wider market in which to secure our fish without the payment of exorbitant tariff taxes added on at the customhouse.

REDUCES TARIFF TAX ON ALL KINDS OF AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS.

It reduces the tariff rates on all kinds of plows, harrows, thrashing machines, wagons and buggies, and all kinds of farming implements used on the farm. These articles should, in my judgment, go on the free list, but remember we have a Republican Senate and a Republican President to deal with, and we have to take the best we can get until you give us commission to legislate for you in both ends of the Capitol and at the White House.

WILL NOT AFFECT WHEAT GROWERS.

Again we find the inspired by cash and patriotism journals and oracles contending that we are discriminating against the American farmer because we cut the Payne tariff rate on wheat from 25 cents per bushel to 12 cents. My answer to this charge is that the 25-cent rate nor the 12-cent rate has not in the past and will not in the future have anything whatever to do with the price of wheat in this country or in Canada. There is not a country in this world that can compete with us in the raising of wheat anyway, and the tariff has been but an idle recital on the statute book, without affording the farmer one grain of protection in sheaf, at the granary, the elevator, or the mill. It is charged that wheat is 10 cents higher on our side than on the Canadian side. This is true but partially. Both crops are controlled largely, if not absolutely, by the price in Liverpool, and in some cases from local conditions, usually transportation facilities, there are variances of 10 or more cents per bushel. It is, however, true that wheat in Winnipeg is higher than in the States for more than one-third of the year. I submit the prices of wheat often vary this much within a single State, and the figures do not prove that generally such is the case, and the safe prediction to make is that, the conditions being practically the same, the price of the land and labor being practically the same, both crops being controlled by the Liverpool market, the prices are not essentially different. This, of course, is not a universal rule, for local conditions vary the prices; also, corners or hoarding oftentimes are causes for wheat going up or down suddenly.

To the end that we may not be mistaken about the matter, let us consult the statistics to ascertain just how much wheat we sent to Canada last year. In 1910 we sent to Canada to get the benefit of the outrageously low price referred to by those opposing this pact 2,111,370 bushels of wheat; and how interesting it is to observe that only 135,441 bushels of wheat came from Canada to get the benefit of our high prices, asserted to be caused by our tariff on wheat of 25 cents per bushel! The charge of the high-protection advocate will answer itself when these figures are analyzed. How refreshing it must be to the American farmer to know that he is no longer to be the cat's-paw that is to shield the greedy manufacturer while he grows rich from legislation and pleads for the farmer to stand by him because there has appeared on the statute book an idle recital of 25 cents a bushel on wheat! Such a proceeding is merely the selling to the farmers razors that will not shave. It is merely deceiving to get the farmer's help to further deceive the poor consumer of this country, who has hunger gnawing at his very stomach and whose poor cupboard is bare. [Applause.]

I tell you, sir, I rejoice to see this mask torn from their insincere faces and let the American producer and consumer come into his own. I am proud that the American farmer is one who neither needs nor asks protection. He merely asks honest, open, frank treatment. He merely asks honest, frank government, economically administered, where every man stands equal before the law. He merely asks fair treatment and no more, and asks no more idle recitals which are only intended to deceive, with no corresponding advantage to him. [Applause.]

CORN SCHEDULE—EXAMINE IT CLOSELY.

High protectionists who are trying to beat this pact by means fair or foul have even gone so far as to assert that when this bill becomes a law that it will reduce the corn growers to poverty and bring want and disaster to their very door.

Pause for a moment and let us ascertain to what extent this charge is true. Last year the United States produced 3,125,713,000 bushels of corn, of which we exported 44,072,209 bushels to Canada. Canada last year produced only 18,726 bushels, of which 5,881 was imported into this country from Canada. Can there be a man so ignorant or unfair as to claim that Canada is any competitor for us in corn? Can there be a man so unfair of mind or thought that would teach or try to teach the American farmer that the 15 cents per bushel provided for by the Payne bill has had in the past or ever will have in the future anything to do with the price of corn? I tell you, sir, this tariff for the farmer has been and is now a delusion and a snare merely to blind his honest and unsuspecting eyes to the end that they may exploit him and the consumer at the same time. Is there a farmer in all the land outside of the city of Pittsburg who fears that the reduction of the duty on corn will affect his future endeavors at raising corn? The question but answers itself, and it is but an humble example of the viciousness and deception of the Payne bill from beginning to the very end. Is it any wonder that they, the Republican Party that tried to father it, were retired last year? Is it not within the realm of respectable prophecy that it will be some time before such an unfair party will be restored to power?

VEGETABLES ON FREE LIST WILL HELP OUR PRODUCERS.

Enemies of the pact, some inspired by patriotism, some by greed, and some by cash, assert that it puts the vegetables on the free list and thereby is a stroke at the farmer. Again we may answer the charge that it is unfair to our people by observing that we exported to Canada last year in vegetables $865,563, while Canada sent us from their borders but $682,455, and the tariff was higher in Canada than in this country. So it can readily be observed that to sweep away the duty on vegetables or to reduce it to any marked degree would be beneficial to our people rather than detrimental. It would be a widening of our market for the producer without any serious competition from them, for if we exceeded them in exports last year with the unfavorable tariff rates against us we can surely compete with them when placed on an equality with them, as per the terms of this pact.

HIGH-TARIFF MEN ALWAYS FIGHT RECIPROCITY AND PROPHESY DIRE RESULTS.

It is not unusual or without precedent to find high-tariff advocates denouncing reciprocity treaties. The same dire predictions were made when we entered into reciprocal relations with Hawaii, Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines. Still, in each case we have seen great prosperity and improved conditions spring from them to both countries engaging in them. So eminently true is this statement with reference to Hawaii that under its beneficent terms she became a part of us. Since that era of great denunciation of this pact during the McKinley administration our trade with that country has increased more than fifteen-fold.

Again, we observe that we have reciprocal trade relations with the Philippines, which have a greater population than Canada, and our trade has increased by leaps and bounds, until it has reached the incredible amount of more than 70 per cent in a single year. Upon entering the identical relations with these countries the same hue and cry went up that cheap labor and cheap land and other unworthy conditions would glut our markets and destroy the Republic, but none of their weird prophecies have come true, and I feel that their dire prophecies of to-day will be forgotten on the coming morrow as the stream of prosperity and wholesome results spring from a pact so full of good things and so evenly divided between the two contracting parties.

RECIPROCITY A REAL REVISION OF PAYNE LAW.

I am for the treaty, for it grants the first affirmative relief from the vicious and unconscionable duties of the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill. This is the first chance to take a step in the right direction, in partially, at least, undoing what the Payne bill did. The Republican Party two years ago promised revision and gave it not. They were at the ballot box justly relieved from power, because they did not keep the faith. We were sent here because we were expected to keep the faith. This pact is a reduction of the tariff, and a marked one at that, and let none be deceived or fail to keep the faith by whim, selfishness, or caprice.

PARTY PLATFORM FOR FREE LUMBER.

Let no Democrats return to their people and say they voted against free lumber, when our party platform bears a solemn command so to do! Let no Democrat return to his people with quibbling excuses that he voted "no" for this reason and for that, when practically every implement the farmer uses is reduced in tariff taxes and not a single one increased! Let no Democrat return to his people and be forced to admit that he voted against the removal of the tariff on cotton-seed oil, barb wire, and sewing machines. Let no Democrat return to his people and answer that he voted against this pact for some trivial reason, when it reduces the tariff on 600 items of the Payne bill and does not raise a single item.

OUR DUTY TO KEEP THE FAITH.

The American people sent us here to keep the faith, and we ought to do it. The man that falls without the breastworks will be caught in the same net as the Republicans were when they failed to revise the tariff and keep the faith.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] in a speech some time ago said he was for this pact because it was not a revision of the tariff at all. My friends, I am for it because, in my judgment, it is a marked revision and accomplishes a great deal strictly along Democratic lines. I rejoice that both he and I arrive at the same goal though we travel entirely different paths. Our faces are both toward Democracy and the light of day, and when the final vote is cast it will be two votes to reduce the tariff from whatsoever cause we may elect to cast them. [Applause.]

PRESIDENT TAFT ENTITLED TO NO EULOGY.

Some are disposed to eulogize the President for his great foresight and broad statesmanship in bringing on this pact. I can not with consistence or sense accord him so generous a treatment. For, as we will recall, he signed the Payne bill after banqueting the hosts that made it repeatedly and thereby helped to perpetrate the fraud, and then, in an effort to conceal the wrong, asserted in his Winona speech, and in other speeches as well, that it was the best tariff law ever written.

After swift and effectual repudiation came from the people of every crossroads in all the land, he then sought the nearest route for the band wagon and mounted himself in the front seat and said, "Come on, Democrats; Betty and I killed the bear." But we of the Democratic faith who believe in lowering the tariff must not be shortsighted in such matters, for the American people are farseeing people and know his every political prank and ours as well. His political somersaults will not justify faltering on our part. It should but serve us to heed the pitfalls and avoid the embarrassment. If anyone may be said to really be playing the generous rôle to-day it is the Democratic Party. The Democrats passed reciprocity last session, and they will pass it again this session. We find his high-tariff leaders all against it, and we find our party keeping the faith and championing it.

SWEEP ASIDE FEARS AND FOREBODINGS OF DANGER AND KEEP THE FAITH.

It will not hurt the farmers. The expansion of trade will do them good. No nation can compete with our producers. Labor will not be damaged, but benefited, by the new fields of endeavor that this closer relation with our neighbor will bring.

Pass this bill and release the farmer from bondage, where he has been held by the high protectionists as a buffer to pull through their unholy schemes of high protection and robber tariffs.

Do not longer let the greedy monopolist pick the threadbare pockets of the needy behind tariff walls that are unconscionable, outrageous, and unjust.

I tell you, sir, the American farmer neither needs nor asks protection and special laws for his benefit. He occupies the happy station of being able to say, "We can meet any competition that comes, and we welcome it." His industry, energy, thrift, skill, and intelligence will more than cope with all who may come or go.

The passage of this treaty with Canada is a step toward the goal of a revenue tariff with all the countries of the world and free trade with Canada. By voting for this bill we have our faces toward the light of day. We are but keeping abreast of the changing conditions and the advancing times.

We were sent here to keep the faith, and we must keep it. The Republicans failed to keep the faith in making the Payne bill, and how swift their just rebuke! Their fate is but the common fate of all, for in each life some rain must fall. This treaty reduces the tariff on 600 items and does not increase a single one. I say it is the duty of every Democrat to keep the faith and vote for it.

The ravages of hunger and gnawing of stomachs among our citizenship dulls the patriotism of strong men. Bare cupboards, poverty, and pain turn the hands on the dial of this Republic backward rather than forward, and God forbid that this be done now or in the future. Suffering and pain breed socialism, anarchy, and pain. Let us pass this bill and secure what good there is in it, and let us pass more tariff bills and make greater reductions when and where needed.

Let the high-tariff Republicans and a few misguided insurgents walk hand in hand in error, but let us of the Democratic faith keep the everlasting faith. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I want to yield for several short speeches on this side at this time. I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KONOP].

Mr. KONOP. Mr. Chairman, I am a new Member here and do not want to take much valuable time from the older Members in the discussion of this important measure. I come from the great Republican State of Wisconsin. I come from a State that, I think, has been largely Republican in name but not Republican in principle. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I come from the great State of Wisconsin, which is strongly Republican; but as long as I have taken any interest in political affairs I have always stood for and believed in the principles of the Democratic Party, and I believe in those principles now. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And more so, Mr. Chairman, do I believe in the principles that I have so long fought for and sought for now, because what occurred last Thursday and Friday proves to me conclusively that the principles of the Democratic Party are right. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why, gentlemen, I remember the time when the principle of electing United States Senators by the people was first proposed it was denounced by the Republicans as socialism. I also remember the time when the Democrats proposed to have publication of campaign contributions before election instead of after election, so that the American people might know where the money comes from that pollutes the American electorate, and then the Republicans said "Let us publish contributions after the election."

This bill that was passed for the publication of campaign contributions, to my mind, does not go far enough. I believe the American people will in the near future demand that a limitation be placed on the expenditure of money for campaign purposes, so that any man, be he rich or poor, may run for any office in the gift of the American people. [Applause.]

This Canadian reciprocity to my mind is a Democratic proposition. I can not understand how any Democrat on this side of the House can go back before his constituents and say that he is a Democrat if he votes agninst this proposition. I have always believed in the principle of a tariff-for-revenue only, and I believe in it now. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But, gentlemen, my colleague from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], yesterday said that this Canadian pact was discriminatory against the farmer. It is discriminatory, but I ask the same gentleman if every protective-tariff bill enacted by any Congress has not been discriminatory and class legislation? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Just as you begin to tear down the tariff wall, the highly protective tariff wall, you must commence being discriminatory step by step until you reduce the tariff down to a revenue basis. [Applause.]

It is discriminatory, but if the gentlemen on the other side who are opposed to this pact love the American farmer so much, we will give them an opportunity to love him hard, to love and kiss and hug him before we get done. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

There have been different arguments advanced in the discussion of this Canadian reciprocity pact, and one of these maintained by some gentlemen on this side is, that it will not reduce the price of grain but will reduce the cost of living. My colleague from Wisconsin maintains the contrary. He says that it will reduce the price of grain and not reduce the cost of living. I believe, Mr. Chairman, in taking the bull by the horns. I have been born and brought up on a farm. I have worked on a farm and I know the hardships of a farmer, and I believe in being fair and honest with him and tell him the truth.

It seems to me that those arguments are absolutely inconsistent, and you can not reconcile them. If this Canadian pact is going to reduce the price of farm products, it will necessarily reduce the cost of living; and, vice versa, the contrary is true. Now, then, what is the use of quibbling, figuring in a few cents here and a few cents there? Suppose that this pact should reduce the price of wheat, and suppose it should reduce by a few cents the price of other farm products that go to make up the provisions of the people, yet I believe that in this pact there is enough that the farmer will gain by reductions of the tariff on other things that he has to buy, so that he will be fully recompensed. We have been dillydallying and quibbling over a few cents here and a few cents there; but, gentlemen, what of those men who labor in the city, in the mill, and in the factories, men who have been begging and praying for more food? What of their appeal for bread? Go to the home of some our laborers in our cities. Go to that lowly hovel where poverty, grim and relentless, stands on the threshold. Look at the lean and hungry look of mother and children, and ask the farmer if he will deny more bread. I know the American farmer. I know his sympathetic and patriotic heart; it beats in unison with his coworker in the city. It is not a matter of dollars and cents, but it is a matter of justice and right between man and man. My friends, if this Canadian pact is going to partly reduce the cost of living for those people, I am in favor of it, because I hope to God that in this great country of ours no American citizen need deny himself the three essentials of life—food, shelter, and clothing. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I come from a farming community, and I want to say right here that I also come from a paper-manufacturing community. I come from a community that has 17 or 18 paper mills and pulp mills; and yet, my friends, I believe that if I vote for this pact I will benefit this country at large, and I would not be selfish and come here and vote against it when it will be a benefit to the country at large simply for the sake of benefiting the paper mills in my district. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I was elected in a Republican district, a Republican district that cast 5,000 majority for the Republican candidate for governor. I had the courage to put in my platform a declaration in favor of free paper, free pulp wood, and free pulp; and yet I was elected in a paper-mill district. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I can not and will not violate that pledge now. I had a meeting before I came to this session of Congress with several paper-mill men in my district, and they told me that they wanted to be fair, and I believe that they are fair. Some here have attacked the Paper Trust, but I want to say that the paper manufacturers in my district are not unreasonable, and they were fair in their demands. They said:

We are in favor of having absolute free trade in paper, pulp wood, and pulp between Canada and the United States; we are able to compete with all the world. We want absolute free trade with Canada, and if Canada would remove her restrictions on the exportation of pulp wood from Crown lands, we would be in favor of this Canadian pact.

In looking over the hearings before the Committee on Finance of the United States Senate I ran across some statements made by a paper manufacturer of my own State, Mr. John Strange, a man known in political circles, a former lieutenant governor of our State, and a paper manufacturer. Before that committee he made this statement:

The error which has lodged in the public mind concerning the need of Canadian wood because of a possible depletion of our forests has been the predominant reason for demanding a concession in favor of Canada. I say, gentlemen, without fear of successful contradiction, that we do not now need, nor have we ever needed, nor will we ever need, Canadian spruce or other paper wood, any more than we will need Canadian cucumbers or dandelions.

That is the statement of a paper manufacturer who claims that we have enough pulp wood in our own country never to need the pulp wood of Canada. Further on, on page 7 of this document, he goes on and says:

The Menominee Indian Reservation, over which so much contention has been had with reference to the wisdom of manufacturing under the direction of the Government and employing the Indians, contains approximately 3,000,000,000 feet of virgin timber, and grows enough wood to supply all of the fiber needed for all of the print mills in Wisconsin. As far as the Indian interests are concerned, it would be a matter of good public policy to create a large pulp plant there to utilize that which is going to waste in connection with a sawmill. The Menominee Reservation is quite sufficient to grow at least 500 cords of wood per day.

Minnesota owns enough timber to supply the needs of all of the mills in Wisconsin and Minnesota. The increase will do that, fostered by the State forester. Wisconsin has taken steps to purchase a million acres of old cut-over lands and others; and by reforesting those lands a supply largely in excess of the consumption of the mills of Wisconsin would be provided. Michigan is acquiring title to from two to three million acres. Without any great effort upon the part of the three States I have named, 20 years hence they will have an abundant supply of forests, more than adequate to furnish all the lumber and paper products that the trade will demand.

This is a statement from a paper-mill man of the State of Wisconsin. He says there is enough pulp wood for the manufacturer of Wisconsin, and I suppose the same fact is true more or less in New York and New England. On page 9 of the same document appears the following statement of Mr. Strange:

I can not comprehend, gentlemen, how an error of this extent ever got into the public mind. I have stood single-handedly against all the paper manufacturers from the time this agitation started. I said, "Argue this proposition solely upon the ground of free trade or protection as a fundamental policy. The supply of timber is so superfluous in this discussion that it ought not to enter into it." I can point you to where we have four times as much growing timber as we can possibly consume, without any thought of preservation or protection.

Now, I want to say right here, I hoped and wished that this agreement would have provided for absolute free trade, and it would have provided for absolute free trade if Canada would have consented to it. But, my friends, I believe it is a step in the right direction. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] quoted slightingly the expression, "equal rights to all and special privileges to none." That doctrine is a Democratic doctrine; it is a Democratic axiom; and let us apply it to every measure that this House will enact. Equal rights to all and special privileges to none is an axiom that need not only be applied to tariff legislation but to all other legislation enacted by every legislative body in every country of the world. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I have two short speeches on this side, and I would desire to yield to those gentlemen.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman has used about an hour and twenty minutes on his side, and I would now be glad to yield some time. How much time would the gentleman desire to yield now?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to yield 45 minutes, and then I will yield back to the gentleman's side of the House. I desire to yield to two gentlemen.

Mr. DALZELL. Very well.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. Chairman, mindful of the custom of this House to regard a new Member as a political accident, I rise with humility to address myself to the question of Canadian reciprocity.

In coming here, I came with a mandate of a great constituency to help reduce the high cost of living, and I regard this bill as the first step in that direction. I came here, Mr. Chairman, from a district normally Republican. I came here as a Democrat, but elected, or helped in the election, by, I compute, 10,000 Republican votes, so that I may be regarded as a kind of eclectic in politics.

The question is, What has the tariff to do with the high cost of living? Out of the mouths of the fathers of Republicanism I think we can answer, for, if I remember correctly, Mr. Blaine, Mr. Sherman, and Mr. Garfield proclaimed themselves protectionists, but protectionists who believed in a protection that should lead to free trade. Their argument was simple. They asked for a tariff against things from without in order to induce production within. They argued that cutting off competition from without would enable home producers to charge more within; that these increased prices would induce competition among producers within this country; that this competition among domestic producers would reduce domestic prices; and that ultimately these domestic prices would fall so far that they would be no higher than foreign prices, and that then this country could throw down the tariff wall and proclaim free trade with all the world.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what has been the course of things? It has been just this, that we have piled up a tariff which has increased prices in the United States. Concurrently with that has come the formation of combinations within our country for controlling production here and keeping prices up, and even driving them higher. So that, instead of leading to reduced prices and free trade, the tariff policy has been accompanied by trust and other monopoly combinations and to higher prices.

Therefore, carrying the mandate of my constituency, I rise here to support this Canadian reciprocity bill with a view of breaking down some of these combinations and reducing prices by letting in competition from outside.

I have been in Canada quite recently. How are these Canadian people different from us? I should say that there is little or no difference. I found that on getting close to the Canadian line Canadian money mingled with our own currency. I found after I got over the line that our currency mingled with the Canadian currency; that Canadian and United States money freely passed and without distinction among Americans and Canadians. I found that I could go into a Canadian post office and with United States money buy Canadian stamps. I found that the people on both sides of the line interchange newspapers, and that the whole current of life is concurrent; that the people north of us were practically of us; that the one thing that separates us is the humbug tariff. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We need no protection of forts or arms on either side of the line. We need nothing to make us one people save the opportunity to exchange freely—that same relation that exists between State and State. Therefore I have great joy in supporting this reciprocity bill.

In fact, Mr. Chairman, I myself stand upon this side of the House of Representatives in what is perhaps a peculiar relation. I look not only for the time, and I hope it may come speedily, when there shall be no tariff whatsoever north of us, but I look to see no tariff south of us, no tariff east of us, no tariff west of us, but perfect freedom of trade with all the world. [Applause.]

I am the type of American that is not afraid to say he is an absolute free trader. I was so elected, and so long as I live I shall proclaim that truth as I see it. I stand with the Democratic Party now, not because I believe that the Democratic Party believes as I do, or, at least, declares as I do, but because it is, at least, moving in that direction. I am glad to be of the party that has its face toward the light.

I heard the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] talk yesterday on this floor about cotton. He talked of the pathetic condition to which American labor would be reduced from any breaking down of the tariff walls with a people east of us or west of us. He talked about Japanese labor and Japanese cotton mills. Let me tell you that I have been in these Japanese cotton mills; that I visited the cotton mills of Osaka; that I have seen American machinery in their mills, and German machinery, and English machinery, and Japanese machinery; that I have seen the operatives working at these machines. I have verified the fact that American laborers in similar occupations are paid very much higher wages than the Japanese laborers. That would seem to be as far as we need go. It is as far as we are carried, at least, by the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber. But let me explain this, Mr. Chairman: Gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber who produce these facts fail to produce another most important fact that should accompany them, namely, the fact that relates to the productive power of the respective laborers in the two countries. I found on my visit to the Osaka mills that while precisely the same machinery is used in both countries—the same machinery in Osaka as that used in the Carolina mills, for instance—and that while wages in the Japanese mills were one-fourth the rate of those paid in the Carolina mills, the productive capacity of labor in Japan was but one-fourth of that in the Carolinas.

From this fact and facts like it I base the declaration that, while we pay higher wages in this country, we are preeminently the machine-making and machine-using people of the world. Because of this our laborer produces, dollar for dollar, more than the laborer anywhere else in the world. I assert, and I am ready to prove, that our people, because of their high wages, are not at a disadvantage in production. They are, on the contrary, at a distinct advantage. Because we have higher wages in this country we have the most productive labor in the world. We produce more machines, we get more from them, because we use intelligence with our labor, because we mix brain power with manual power. We have the greatest natural resources in the world and the labor that produces cheapest; and hence we can, if we have absolute freedom of exchange, become the greatest producer in the world.

My colleagues here on this Democratic side, be not afraid. Courage is what our people want now. They will vote for men, they will support parties that have courage. It is what we most need in this time of our history.

For the high cost of living is the greatest of all questions just now. I come from the part of the country that most needs a reduction in the cost of living. New York City is the greatest, the richest, the grandest of all our cities, and yet side by side with these riches is revealed the gauntest poverty. One of the gentlemen on the other side just a few minutes ago spoke of this. He referred to our towering buildings. We are about to put up a 50-story building. But we have buildings with several subcellars. Yet we have conditions there that, alas, beat the world for degredation of mankind. Nowhere is population so congested. We have village populations in square blocks. We have in two contiguous square blocks enough children to fill a whole public school, and that school is made to accommodate 2,500 children. We bury 10 per cent of our people in potter's field at public expense. We have conditions that were never seen in any civilization of the world. God knows that this question of the cost of living is the direst one that can come before a large part of our people. Then, what shall we do about this tariff? I am here to work for a reduction of it. Let it be ever so little as a start, I will work for that. I will patiently serve for that.

But I hope, Mr. Chairman, that this is but the beginning. My hope is and my feeling is that it is but the beginning. My hope for years has been that once we would raise the tariff issue the whole sham and swindle of it would come tumbling down.

We have the greatest natural resources in the world. We have the most wonderful and potent mingling of bloods. We have the largest homogeneous population. We have the greatest possibilities in production.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I take great pleasure in supporting this bill. Though I be the only man in this House to stand as a free trader, I do so here, because I believe that before a great while the predominant political issue in this country is going to be the straight-out issue, not of percentages, not as to a little tariff reduction here and a little tariff increasing there, but as between the principle of protection on the one hand and of free trade on the other. I long to see that kind of freedom of commerce that will knit together the nations of the earth; that will lead us to perceive the folly of great war navies and the wisdom rather of sinking such navies in the bottom of the sea, and of binding ourselves to the other bodies of mankind by bonds of trade. A free commerce will bind us closer than all the treaties in this world. Then will not rise a question of what the Japanese are going to do to us or what the Germans are going to do to us, of what the English are going to do to us. It will be a question of better, larger, wider production and exchange. It will build up our factories as nothing else will build them. It will make real progress in the conditions of labor, as against warfare and increasing hardships under the false system of protection. It will mean a prosperity that this country has never before seen. It will mean freedom, the heritage of our Nation, and it will lead to another great step forward in the great cause of progress. Mr. Chairman, I yield back any time I have not used. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GREGG].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it may be of interest to the gentlemen in this Chamber, in view of the position which I take in regard to reciprocity, to inform you that the district I represent is probably one of the most important in the United States. It is known as the twenty-second congressional district of Pennsylvania, and is composed of the counties of Butler and Westmoreland. My home county, Westmoreland, is bounded on the west by the district which the learned and distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has the honor to represent. It contains—as a matter of fact, is the second in point of production of bituminous coal in the State of Pennsylvania, its coal fields producing what is known as the great Connellsville coking coal, the Greensburg steam coal, and the Irwin gas coal, which latter is known to most people who live in the cities of Philadelphia and New York for the reason that it is used exclusively as a gas coal. Within the confines of my district there are also several large plants of the United States Steel Co. Within the confines of that district there is located also one of the largest plants of the American Window Glass Co., besides probably the largest tin-plate factory in the United States and one of the largest aluminum factories in the United States and a large wire factory. In Butler County there is located what is known as the Standard Steel Car Co., and, in addition, probably one of the greatest oil-producing territories in the North—what is known as the Butler field. Moreover, it is a distinctly agricultural district, probably more than one-third of its inhabitants being engaged in the honorable, honest, and staid pursuit of farming, and everywhere is seen the fructifying results of honest toil. Consequently you see that probably, from a political standpoint, I should be a protectionist and should be opposed to the question of Canadian reciprocity. But I desire to say here that, although I represent a district having over 310,000 inhabitants, I have not heard one single word of protest from the many interests which I represent.

To my mind, this bill should be passed, first, because of the natural conditions. There is no more reason for a tariff wall between Canada and the United States than there should be between the States lying east of the Mississippi and the States lying west of the Mississippi. It is an economic problem, not a political one. It is a problem which, to my mind, appeals to the broad statesmanship of every individual Member of this House.

Mr. James J. Hill, in an address which he delivered in Chicago on the 15th of February, said:

> The proposed reciprocity agreement is an example of constructive statesmanship. In contrast to many of the matters that come before Congress, it is fashioned to large national ends, and it is inspired by a policy which the greatest minds of the country have approved.
> The proposed agreement is only the embodied voice of a mutually beneficial trade intercourse demanding its rightful freedom.

The same people, the same climate, and the same natural conditions exist in Canada as exist in our own country. They speak our language; we theirs. The children of the Canadians are taught the same three "R's" that we learned in our boyhood. They have the same civilization, a civilization that was made possible when the courageous Bouquet and his brave comrades drove Pontiac and his warriors from the wilderness of western Pennsylvania.

Secondly, we have precedent in supporting this bill, because, as has been said here in this House, in 1854 there was enacted a bill which to a very large extent was the same as this one and known as the Elgin treaty. This reciprocal arrangement, which proved very advantageous to the people of the United States, was abrogated in 1866 by reason of political differences between Canada and the United States, growing out of the Civil War.

Turning, then, to the other side of this question, I think I am justified in saying that the opposition to this treaty comes principally, first, from the lumber interests, which have been liberally treated by the Payne-Aldrich bill, and whose chief business seems to be an endeavor to corner all the timber and lumber in our country and increase the cost of the building of an American home; second, from the paper combination, which has been once, and recently, dissolved by a Federal court; third, from those who desire to arouse public sentiment among the farmers of this country in order that they themselves may benefit politically by it. Therefore I say that the opposition to this bill comes largely—in fact, almost exclusively—from those who have selfish motives.

It is conceded, I believe, that the official statistics show that trade is in our favor. I refer now to a document issued by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], taken from statistics furnished by the various departments of this Government, and which I ask unanimous consent to print as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 31, 1911.

DEAR SIR: On April 4 Congress will take up Canadian reciprocity. It were well for the people to be considering it also. It is a subject upon which there is much misunderstanding.

The Lumber Trust and the Paper Trust are waging a fierce fight against reciprocity. They are making desperate efforts to get the farmers to join them. Wherever possible they have enlisted the papers which circulate among the farmers. They try to make the farmers believe that, by reason of the tariff, he gets more than the fair market price for his products.

Canada has a tariff which operates against our products sold in Canada; we have a tariff which operates against Canadian products sold here. Reciprocity is an agreement between the two countries to modify both tariffs with a view to more extended trade.

In spite of these obstructive tariffs a large trade has grown up between us and Canada. In five years ending June 30, in goods of all kinds—

We sold in Canada	$886,417,376
Canada sold to us	393,913,673
Difference in our favor	492,503,703

These figures show that Canada is a good country for us to trade with. Any country which buys from us more than it sells to us is a good country to trade with. No tariff wall should stand between us and such a country.

You are from Missouri. Let me show you.

Government statistics for five years ending June 30.

HORSES.

We sold in Canada	$14,172,075
Canada sold to us	2,549,201
Difference in our favor	11,622,874

CATTLE.

We sold in Canada	$1,578,179
Canada sold to us	1,193,796
Difference in our favor	384,383

MEAT AND DAIRY.

We sold in Canada	$17,011,017
Canada sold to us	904,191

BREADSTUFFS.

We sold in Canada	$31,590,556
Canada sold to us	6,679,884
Difference in our favor	24,910,672

Of these items, which are largely produced in Missouri, we sold to Canada $53,030,755 more than Canada sold to us. Upon these articles we had to pay the Canadian tariff. But for this Canadian tariff our balance on these items would have been still larger. Reciprocity would relieve us from that hindrance to our trade. How, then, could reciprocity hurt the Missouri farmer?

You ask why Canada favors reciprocity if it is to give us the best of it on these products? The answer is easy.

First. The Canadian tariff is added to the price which the Canadian consumer must pay. Canada desires to relieve her people from this extra price.

Second. Canada is willing to take her tariff off of the goods which we sell her if in return we will take our tariff off of the paper, wood pulp, and lumber which she sells us. Even with our high tariff against her Canada has, during the period of time under consideration, sold us $98,668,630 more paper, pulp, and lumber than we sold her. If our tariff against these products were removed she would sell us a still larger amount of these timber products. How could that hurt the Missouri farmer?

Who then would be hurt by reciprocity? I will tell you. The Lumber Trust and the Paper Trust. Reciprocity would bring Canadian lumber and paper here to be sold in competition with the American lumber and paper. This would give the American people cheaper paper—the Missouri farmer cheaper lumber to build houses and barns. So you see why it is that these trusts are making such frantic efforts to defeat reciprocity. They desire to hold a monopoly of the American lumber and paper markets.

These trusts are very active now trying to fool the farmer. Every newspaper and farmers' paper which can be controlled will carry scare headlines in an effort to alarm the farmer about reciprocity. The trusts always have money to conduct their campaigns. Let the farmer be of good cheer. He is not the fellow who will be hit by reciprocity. He will be helped. The Lumber Trust and the Paper Trust are they who will feel the weight of this measure.

Let me show you about the Paper Trust. Knowing that I represent an intelligent people, I felt that I would like to call their attention to some of the facts connected with reciprocity, so they could have a clearer understanding of the subject as its discussion progresses. I could think of no other way to disseminate these facts so well as by sending out this letter. I have sent it to over 30,000 people. How much do you suppose I had to pay for simply the plain paper upon which these letters are written? Just $40. That is the sort of prices you pay for writing paper, newspapers, schoolbooks, etc. Reciprocity would cut these prices. No wonder the Paper Trust opposes reciprocity.

Yours, truly, DORSEY W. SHACKLEFORD.

Mr. GREGG of Pennsylvania. In this letter it is disclosed, as was stated on the floor of the House yesterday, that in the five years ending June 30, 1910, in goods of all kinds the difference in our favor was $492,503,703, while along certain other lines, largely the products of the farm, we sold to Canada $53,030,755 more than Canada sold to us.

If these are the conditions, then I can see no particular objection to the passage of this bill.

It is argued upon the floor of this House that the admission of certain foodstuffs without duty will increase the supply and consequently be injurious to the producer. It would follow, then, that if the supply was increased the price to the consumer would be decreased.

I would especially appeal to-day for the man who earns his living and supports his family by honest toil and by the sweat of his brow—for the man with the pick in the mine, for the man behind the plow, for the man behind the throttle, for the man in the factory, for the man behind the counter, and the man at the desk. I appeal for the great toiling masses who pay the exacting taxes which support the Government and respond to the call of their country in her hour of danger.

It may be that there are some inequalities in this bill, but if there are inequalities in it and in the schedules as provided in this pact between Canada and the United States, and those inequalities may to some extent affect the people of the district which I have the honor to represent, I know that the same patriotism which has controlled their action in the past will actuate them in the future, to the end that the greatest good may be rendered to the greatest number, that the many may be served rather than the few. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania use some of his time?

Mr. DALZELL. I yield one hour to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PICKETT].

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to express my indebtedness to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GEORGE] for clarifying the atmosphere on one phase of this debate. Selected by the leader of the majority as one of the spokesmen for the Democratic Party in the discussion of this question, we have a right to assume that he, in part, at least, expresses the ultimate aim of his party in respect to the tariff question. I refer to the statement made but a few moments ago on this floor that he is "an absolute free trader," and that he is standing with the Democratic Party because it is "moving in that direction." We on this side of the aisle will be glad to meet that issue now, as we have met it in the years past, for it has been lifted from the arena of controversy before the American electorate by the logic of facts and the wisdom of experience. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Like my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], I, too, was interested in the remarkable and eloquent address delivered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], but from a different angle. The gentleman from North Carolina referred to the achievements of his party in this House during this session, pointing to the passage by the House of the resolution to amend the Constitution of the United States so as to provide for the election of Senators by a direct vote of the people and to the measure passed a few days since providing for the publicity of campaign contributions before elections. He seemed to enjoy a peculiar feeling of exultation, joined in by his colleagues, who responded with generous applause at his reference to the passage of these two measures. When I recall the fact that a similar resolution has been passed by the House several times in the past, when the Republicans were in control, and when I recall the further fact that a Republican House during the last Congress passed a publicity bill containing the same provisions as the bill passed at this session, I am prompted in the spirit of good humor that has characterized our partisan repartee to suggest the application of that familiar couplet:

> The lightning bug is a brilliant thing, but it hasn't any mind;
> It stumbles through existence with its headlight on behind.

[Laughter.]

But, Mr. Chairman, I rose for the purpose of discussing the measure pending before us. It is perhaps one of the most important measures that has been considered by Congress for many years; one in which the people are deeply interested and which is destined, if enacted into law, to become an absorbing issue in the near political future.

The name given the pact has in itself misled the people into assuming that it is reciprocal in fact as well as in name. It is doubtful if a measure of such importance has ever been presented to the public as one-sidedly as this measure. The metropolitan press, for reasons with which you are all familiar, have to a large extent favored the pact and they in turn have been followed by other papers without an independent examination of the subject. The facts, however, are becoming known and the people are beginning to see that they do not sustain the general statements and conclusions made by those who favor it. Already a strong reaction has set in which will grow stronger as the people study for themselves what it does and what it does not do. It has been held out as a reciprocal trade agreement which implies that Canada is granting to the United States something of equivalent or approximate value for our opening to Canada the best market place in the world for her surplus agricultural products. It has been urged that its effect will be beneficial to our people; that our farmers particularly will not be injured (but when speaking of the farmer they always speak in the negative); that our manufacturers, and especially those engaged in manufacturing agricultural implements, will be benefited by gaining access to Canadian markets on advantageous terms. To those on this side of the aisle it is said to be in harmony with the policy of reciprocity for which our party has stood in the past and which our great leaders have advocated. In brief, it is held out as a diplomatic victory, the culminating and crowning achievement of long years of effort on the part of the United States, and that those who oppose it are standing as obstructionists in the path of progress.

In his address before the Chicago Association of Commerce, February 15, 1911, the Hon. Philander C. Knox, Secretary of State, said:

This brief outline brings in a general way the history of reciprocity in our trade relations with Canada down to the work of this administration and shows the historical fact that for more than half a century the statesmen of Canada, of Great Britain, and of the United States have, by repeated effort, testified and reaffirmed an abiding and fundamental belief in the principle of American-Canadian reciprocity.

The clear inference from the foregoing is that this country for half a century has been striving to secure an agreement such as is now proposed from Canada, and that the agreement is in accord with the policy of reciprocity for which our statesmen have stood in the past.

Later on in the same address Mr. Knox said:

The abolition of the reciprocity treaty of 1854 by the United States marked a historical step backward in the trade relations of the two countries.

Speaking in the city of Springfield, Ill., on February 11, 1911, our distinguished President said:

We have taken up these things that are involved in the Canadian reciprocity treaty because opportunity offered. Now is the accepted time. Now Canada is in the mood. She is at the parting of the ways.

In other words, that this is the one psychological moment in the past 50 years when Canada has been in the mood to enter into an agreement of this character.

During the progress of this debate a difference of opinion has been expressed relative to the effect of the former treaty. The distinguished Representative from New York [Mr. HARRISON], in his remarks yesterday, observed that the cause of the abolition of the former treaty was not economic.

It seems to me proper that the historical facts should be clearly and fairly presented to the people, not only with respect to the former treaty and its effect, but also as to the attitude of both this country and Canada toward a renewal of that treaty. It is a familiar rule of law, with which our profession is familiar, that the courts will follow the construction which contracting parties themselves give to an agreement. I therefore propose to take up the former treaty and show how the two countries regarded it when the facts were before them, when they could see the conditions at the very time when they were charged with the responsibility of passing judgment upon it, and then I propose to follow it down to the present time and show from the records that there has never been a time in the history of our country since the abolition of the former treaty when any of our great statesmen, or the people themselves, would have supported the proposition that is now before us.

HISTORY OF TREATY OF 1854 REVIEWED—SIMILAR TO PROPOSED PACT—EFFECT DISASTROUS TO OUR PEOPLE AND TREATY IS ABROGATED BY THE UNITED STATES—VIEWS OF PROMINENT STATESMEN FROM LINCOLN TO M'KINLEY—PERSISTENT EFFORTS OF CANADA TO RENEW CONSISTENTLY OPPOSED BY OUR GOVERNMENT ON GROUND NOT RECIPROCAL.

The treaty of 1854 provided for the free interchange of the following articles:

Grain, flour, and breadstuffs of all kinds; animals of all kinds; fresh, smoked, and salted meats; cotton-wool; seeds and vegetables; undried fruits; dried fruits; fish of all kinds; products of fish and all other creatures living in the water; poultry; eggs; hides, furs, skins, or tails, undressed; stone or marble in its crude or unwrought state; slate; butter; cheese; tallow; lard; horns; manures; ores of metals of all kinds; coal; pitch, tar, turpentine; ashes; timber and lumber of all kinds, round, hewed, and sawed, unmanufactured, in whole or in part; firewood; plants, shrubs, and trees; pelts; wool; fish oil; rice; broom corn and bark; gypsum, ground or unground; hewn or wrought or unwrought burr or grindstones; dyestuffs; flax, hemp, and tow, unmanufactured; unmanufactured tobacco.

It will be observed that so far as the interchange of natural products is concerned, and particularly the products of the farm, that Mr. Fielding, the Canadian minister, in making his report recently to the House of Commons of Canada of the proposed agreement, was right when he said that it was "the former treaty with comparatively little change."

I will discuss the question of the slight reductions in manufactured articles later on. That treaty was concluded in June, 1854, and went into effect in March, 1855. Within a few years after the treaty became operative its effect was such that the people began to call upon Congress to pass a resolution giving notice of its termination. Congress took such action in January, 1865, and the treaty was terminated in March, 1866. As I have suggested, the practical effect of the treaty on the prosperity of the people of this country was then before Congress and the people. I now propose to show from the records that the cause of its abolition on the part of our country was purely economic, the discussions both in the House and in the Senate being directed solely to the result of the treaty on our interests. In view of the similarity of the treaties, the opinions expressed at that time by men whose names stand forth in history as among our great leaders are of peculiar significance now. I quote briefly from Mr. Elihu B. Washburn, of Illinois, who said:

I am for the unconditional abrogation of the treaty. Every Member must see that the treaty as it now exists ought to be changed, and if it is to be changed I say let us in the first place abrogate the treaty entirely. If Great Britain, which derives, as I contend, all the benefits of the treaty, wants another, let her come and ask us, and do not let us go to her.

Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, expressed himself as follows:

The people of the United States have been uneasy under the reciprocity treaty for several years—I may almost say from its date. There was a feeling that it was more advantageous to Canada than to the United States; that, in short, it was unilateral. This feeling has of late ripened into conviction.

In the present case the feeling is ripening very rapidly into a conviction that the pending agreement is unilateral, and as soon as the facts are known this feeling will become a conviction.

John Sherman, of Ohio, spoke as follows:

The treaty has operated from its beginning against our interests, and it can be plainly demonstrated by the tables which are furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury that from the beginning our trade has fallen off and theirs increased, comparatively. While the goods we receive from Canada come to us duty free, except to a very insignificant amount, they charge us duty on more than half of what we send to them. Can that be said to be reciprocal? Our exports and our imports, our trade with Canada, is about equal; we send to them nearly as much as they send to us, but they charge us duties on one-half of what we send to them. We substantially admit all that they send us free. Such a statement as that—and it can not be gainsaid and can not be denied—shows that the treaty is unequal and that there is no reciprocity in it.

What John Sherman said had been the effect of the former treaty as to the imports from Canada coming in free while our exports to Canada were dutiable we know in advance will be the effect of the proposed agreement.

Senator Chandler, of Michigan, characterizes the treaty as follows:

If instead of a treaty of reciprocity this treaty had been called a treaty to encourage emigration from the United States into Canada, a treaty to encourage production in Canada instead of in the United States, it would have been more justly named.

Those words can be applied with equal force to the agreement before us.

Senator Foote from one of the New England States expressed himself as follows:

I believe it to be very generally conceded that while this reciprocity treaty, so denominated, has proved highly beneficial to the interests of the people of the British Provinces, and has contributed very largely to their interest and prosperity, it has, at the same time, proved injurious and prejudicial to the interest and prosperity of the American States. The very title of the treaty is a misnomer. There is nothing reciprocal about it; there is nothing reciprocal in its operation; it produces no reciprocity of benefits between the two Governments. It is beneficial to one only of the contracting parties and injurious to the other. Such are the practical results of its operation. This, at all events, is the prevailing, if not quite the unanimous, opinion of the American people, who now, after an experience of its effects for 10 years, demand as with one voice the abrogation of a contract which they regard as partial, unjust, inequitable, and one sided, as soon as it can be done through the forms prescribed in the treaty itself.

I want to commend to the Representatives from New England the position taken by another distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, afterwards Vice President of the United States, and a great commoner of the people, Mr. Wilson, who, in speaking on the treaty said:

When this treaty was negotiated, it was believed to be for the general interests of the country, and in Massachusetts it was especially believed to be for our fishing, manufacturing, commercial, and railroad interests. I have ever been in favor of the treaty, and up to this time could never have been induced to vote against it. I am not clear now that it is not for the interests of the State I in part represent to let it stand. I am inclined to think that it is for our interest that the treaty should stand as it now does. For the interests of the whole country, I am of the opinion that it ought to be modified or perhaps abrogated.

Mr. Blaine, who was then in the House, voted in favor of terminating the treaty, and while I do not find in the RECORD any expressions of opinion at that time, he reviews the subject in his Twenty Years in Congress, as follows:

The right in the fisheries conceded by the treaty of 1854—originally ours under the treaty of 1782 and unnecessarily and unwisely renounced in the treaty of 1818—was not given freely, but in consideration of a great price. That price was reciprocity of trade, so called, between the United States and the British North American Provinces in certain commodities named in the treaty. The selection, as shown in the schedules, was made almost wholly to favor Canadian interests. There was scarcely a product in the list which could be exported from the United States to Canada without loss, while the great market of the United States was thrown open for nearly everything which she could produce and export. All her raw materials were admitted free, while all our manufactures were charged with heavy duty, the market being reserved for English merchants. The fishery question had been adroitly used to secure from the United States an agreement which was one sided, vexatious, and unprofitable. It has served its purpose admirably as a makeweight for Canada in acquiring the most generous and profitable market she ever enjoyed for her products.

The resolution calling upon the President to give notice of the termination of the treaty was passed by the Senate with only eight dissenting votes, which fairly illustrates the view of the people at that time as to the treaty.

Among those who voted to terminate the treaty were Senators Grimes and Harlan, of Iowa; Mr. Allison, of Iowa, then in the House and afterwards of long and distinguished service in the Senate; John A. Kasson, of Iowa, then in the House and whose eminent career as a diplomatist is known to you all.

The resolution was signed by Abraham Lincoln.

And now I desire to trace the subsequent history of our country and of Canada in respect to a renewal of the treaty, for the attitude of the parties in reference to its renewal is the strongest evidence of how they regarded its effect.

In January, 1866, a delegation came to Washington from Canada with a view of opening negotiations for the renewal of the treaty, but it does not appear that our Government gave them any encouragement. In February, 1866, and before the treaty had, in fact, expired, Sir Frederick Bruce, the British minister, made an effort to reopen negotiations and addressed a formal letter with that in view to our Secretary of State, Mr. Seward, one of the greatest premiers of all our history. In the letter of Mr. Bruce are these significant words, which well expresses the feeling of Great Britain on the subject:

Her Majesty's Government would be well content to renew the treaty in its present form.

He was undoubtedly right, for there never has been a time, as I will show to you, when they would not have been well content to have renewed the treaty either in the then present form or in the form now proposed. I now read from the reply of Mr. Seward:

The now expiring reciprocity treaty constitutes almost the only case in which the Executive Department has by negotiation assumed a supervision of any question of either commerce or finance. Even in that case the Executive Department did little more than to make a treaty, the details of which had been virtually matured beforehand in the Congress of the United States, and sanction was given to the treaty afterwards by express legislation. The question of continuing the treaty involves mainly subjects of the special character which I have before described. Careful inquiry made during the recess of Congress induced the President to believe that there was then no such harmony of public sentiment in favor of the extension of the treaty as would encourage him in directing negotiations to be opened.

Mr. Seward undoubtedly reflected the feeling of the people at that time. I also commend that portion of his letter relative to the initiative of this character of legislation. In brief, that it should originate in the House, as our forefathers contemplated and provided in the Constitution.

In 1867 the confederation of the various Provinces of Canada was effected, and history tells us that one of the chief issues in the campaign in favor of confederation was that the General Government would be in a better position to urge and secure a renewal of reciprocal relations with this country.

In 1868 the Canadian Government, in the first tariff law passed by it inserted a clause to which I called attention on a former occasion, but for the purpose of the continuity of these observations I will now insert in the RECORD. I find that I do not have the tariff of 1868 with me, so will quote from a later tariff, that of 1879, which is substantially the same.

Section 6 is as follows:

Any or all of the following articles—that is to say, animals of all kinds, green fruit, hay, straw, bran, seeds of all kinds, vegetables (including potatoes and other roots), plants, trees, and shrubs, coal and coke, salt, hops, wheat, peas and beans, barley, rye, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat, and all other grain, flour of wheat and flour of rye, Indian meal and oatmeal, and flour or meal of any other grain, butter, cheese, fish (salted or smoked), lard, tallow, meats (fresh, salted, or smoked), and lumber may be imported into Canada free of duty, or at a less rate of duty than is provided by this act, upon proclamation of the governor in council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that similar articles from Canada may be imported into the United States free of duty, or at a rate of duty not exceeding that payable on the same under such proclamation when imported into Canada.

It will be observed that Canada under this provision held out a standing offer to this country, so far as free interchange of farm products and the products of the forest, etc., are concerned, substantially the same as that now proposed.

In 1869 Sir John Rose, Canadian minister of finance, came to Washington for the purpose of opening negotiations on the subject, but the records tell us that our Government took no steps at that time in the matter. In December, 1869, President Grant, in his message to Congress, referred to the subject as follows:

The question of renewing a treaty for reciprocal trade between the United States and the British Provinces on this continent has not been favorably considered by the administration. The advantages of such a treaty would be wholly in favor of the British producer. Except possibly a few engaged in the trade between the two sections, no citizen of the United States would be benefited by reciprocity.

There seems to be no equivocation in the language of President Grant on the subject or in his statement as to the attitude of our people.

In 1870 the Canadian Government again offered to negotiate on the subject, and in 1871 Sir John McDonald, who was in Washington on other Government business, again sought to open negotiations, but our Government gave no heed to these suggestions.

In 1873–74 representatives of the British Government again brought up the subject with our Government, a form of treaty was drafted, and submitted to President Grant, who, in turn, transmitted it to the Senate. It was rejected in February, 1875.

The Canadian tariff of 1879 carried the provision before referred to.

In 1890 Canada again sent representatives to Washington to secure a reciprocity treaty with this country; that was during the administration of President Harrison and when Mr. Blaine was Secretary of State. Negotiations were pending for a couple of years. In 1892 the Senate passed a resolution requesting the President to transmit to the Senate all information pertaining thereto. And now I want to read from President Harrison's message on the subject:

The result of the conference as to the practicability of arranging a reciprocity treaty with the Dominion of Canada is clearly stated in the letter of Mr. Blaine, and was anticipated, I think, by him and every other thoughtful American who had considered the subject. A reciprocity treaty limited to the exchange of natural products would have been such only in form. The benefits of such a treaty would have inured almost wholly to Canada. Previous experiments on this line had been unsatisfactory to this Government. A treaty that should be reciprocal in fact and of mutual advantage must necessarily have embraced an important list of manufactured articles and have secured to the United States a free or favored introduction—

I ask you to mark the language "free or favored introduction," because I will refer to that proposition a little later on—of these articles into Canada as against the world; but it was not believed the Canadian ministry was ready to propose or assent to such an arrangement. * * * It is not for this Government to argue against this announcement of Canadian official opinion. It must be accepted, however, I think, as the statement of a condition which places an insuperable barrier in the way of that large and beneficial intercourse and reciprocal trade which might otherwise be developed between the United States and the Dominion.

President Harrison understood clearly the theory of a reciprocal trade agreement, which, expressed in simple form, is that our country should receive some consideration for concessions granted to Canada; that when we let Canada into our markets we should be given access to Canadian markets; that access to Canadian markets on the same terms as other nations is not a consideration for opening our markets to Canada, a principle that seems to have been entirely ignored in drafting the agreement before us. President Harrison submits with his message a letter from Mr. Blaine.

The name of James G. Blaine is connected perhaps more than any other great leader of our party with the policy of reciprocity, and I desire that the record show the light in which he viewed the subject at that time, when substantially the same proposition as is now proposed was before him.

I may be pardoned for digressing long enough to say that I was raised in the Republican faith; my belief in the policies of the Republican Party has strengthened as the years have passed. I came into manhood's estate when the "Plumed Knight" was the matchless leader of our party, and I have never ceased my admiration for his leadership or for the policies he advocated. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. Blaine says:

At the first conference, on February 10, the commissioners stated that they were authorized by the Canadian Government to propose the renewal of the reciprocity treaty of 1854—which was terminated in 1866 by the action of the Congress of the United States—with such modifications and extensions as the altered circumstances of both countries and their respective interests might seem to require.

In answer to an inquiry, the commissioners stated that the modifications or extensions contemplated in the schedules of articles should be confined to natural products, and should not embrace manufactured articles.

The commissioners were informed that the Government of the United States would not be prepared to renew the treaty of 1854 nor to agree upon any commercial reciprocity which should be confined to natural products alone; and that, in view of the great development of industrial interests in the United States and of the changed conditions of the commercial relations of the two countries since the treaty of 1854 was negotiated, it was regarded of essential importance that a list of manufactured goods should be included in the schedules of articles for free or favored exchange in any reciprocity arrangement which might be made.

The commissioners then inquired if the Government of the United States would expect to have preferential treatment extended to the list of manufactured goods of the United States on their introduction into Canada by virtue of a reciprocity treaty, or whether it would regard the Canadian Government as at liberty to extend the same favors to the manufactured goods of other countries not parties to the treaty on their introduction into Canada.

That identical proposition is presented to us under the proposed agreement, and now let us see what answer Mr. Blaine gave. His reply was as follows:

The reply given them was that it was the desire of the Government of the United States to make a reciprocity convention which would be exclusive in its application to the United States and Canada, and that other countries which are not parties to it should not enjoy gratuitously the favors which the two neighboring countries might reciprocally concede to each other for valuable considerations and at a large sacrifice of their respective revenues.

I call particular attention to what Mr. Blaine says as to other countries enjoying gratuitously the privileges which we have purchased by giving Canada free access to our markets.

President Harrison, in his fourth annual message, again discussed the matter, concluding with this sentence:

The benefits of an exchange of natural products would be almost wholly with the people of Canada.

I now come to one of blessed memory, whose public life and career were intimately associated with the protective policy of the Republican Party, and who was one of its greatest leaders, but whose name, I regret to say, has been used to conjure favor for an agreement for which not one sentence or one syllable ever uttered by him could be construed as in its favor. I refer to William McKinley. [Applause.] In his inaugural address in 1897 President McKinley said:

The end in view is always to be the opening up of new markets for the products of our country by granting concessions to the products of other lands that we need and can not produce ourselves, and which do not involve any loss of labor of our own people, but tend to increase their prosperity.

I thought of these words when the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] was making his speech. It was indeed entertaining to observe the labored effort of my good friend from Connecticut to square his present attitude with the attitude of our party and with his former attitude on this great economic question. As he walked back and forth, up this aisle and then up this, his face at times resembling the grim visage of Moloch, and again speaking with such pathos that you could imagine the tears dropping from his words, I was reminded of the description by Tolstoi, in one of his novels, of a character who employed "one half his faculties in deceiving himself and the other half in trying to give an appearance of reason to his illusions." [Laughter.]

And now I want to refer to the last speech of McKinley at Buffalo, which has been so tortured by excerptation, in which he said:

By sensible trade arrangements, which will not interrupt our home production, we shall extend the outlets for our increasing surplus. A system which provides a mutual exchange of commodities is manifestly essential to the continued and healthful growth of our export trade. We must not repose in fancied security that we can forever sell everything and buy little or nothing. If such a thing were possible, it would not be best for us or for those with whom we deal. We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor. Reciprocity is the natural outgrowth of our wonderful industrial development under the domestic policy now firmly established.

What we produce beyond our domestic consumption must have a vent abroad. The excess must be relieved through a foreign outlet, and we should sell everywhere we can and buy wherever the buying will enlarge our sales and productions and thereby make a greater demand for home labor.

The period of exclusiveness is past. The expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem. Commercial wars are unprofitable. A policy of good will and friendly trade relations will prevent reprisals. Reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not.

If perchance some of our tariffs are no longer needed for revenue or to encourage and protect our industries at home, why should they not be employed to extend and promote our markets abroad?

It will be noted that McKinley predicated his statement on the foundation stone that whatever agreement is made must be without harm to our industries or labor.

In the Republican national platform of 1900 our party declared:

We favor the associated policy of reciprocity, so directed as to open our markets on favorable terms for what we do not ourselves produce, in return for free foreign markets.

And in 1904 our national platform declared as follows:

We have extended widely our foreign markets, and we believe in the adoption of all practicable methods for their further extension, including commercial reciprocity wherever reciprocal arrangements can be effected consistent with the principles of protection and without injury to American agriculture, American labor, or any American industry.

Such is a brief review of the former treaty and the attitude of the United States and Canada in respect to it. It shows that the former treaty was substantially the same as the present pact. It shows that the treaty of 1854 was abrogated by the United States because it was injurious to the interests of this country. It shows that for half a century Canada has been sitting on the doorstep of our Government, repeatedly and persistently seeking a renewal of that treaty. It shows that our country has consistently, during all of this time, refused to enter into such a treaty on the ground that it would not be reciprocal and would not be for the interests of our people. It shows that our greatest statesmen from Lincoln down to the present, including such names as John Sherman, Elihu Washburne, Zachariah Chandler, Justin Morrill (the father of the Republican policy of protection), William B. Allison, William H. Seward, Ulysses S. Grant, Benjamin Harrison, James G. Blaine, William McKinley, and many others have of record repudiated the former treaty and opposed such so-called reciprocity as Canada has heretofore offered and now proposes. In view of the undisputed facts and records of history, the statement of Mr. Knox that the abolition of the former treaty was a "backward step" is indeed most remarkable.

I submit on this branch of the subject that the pact before us is not in harmony with the policy of the Republican Party nor any of its platform declarations, nor with the position of our leading statesmen.

THE AMERICAN FARMER—PACT NOT IN HARMONY WITH POLICY OF PARTY—NEW SOIL IN COMPETITION WITH OLD—WILL BE UNFAIR TO AGRICULTURAL INTERESTS OF THIS COUNTRY—CANADIAN FARMER SUBSIDIZED—CONDITIONS COMPARED.

I will now turn briefly to its effect on the farmers of our country. During the last Congress I submitted some remarks on this branch of the subject. Other gentlemen who have preceded me have ably covered it. I do not, therefore, feel justified in discussing it with the detail I otherwise would. The effect and, indeed, the very purpose of the bill is to place the products of the farm in free and open competition with Canada. Its advocates on the Republican side, while claiming adherence to the protective policy of our party, propose to exclude the farmer from the application of that policy. Their position and the manifest effect of the bill is an abandonment of the protective policy, so far as the farmer is concerned. When that policy is abandoned as to one-third of our people—one-third of our producers—the policy fails. Our party has never before urged a policy of half protection and half free trade. The Democratic side favor the bill, saying it is a step in the right direction. They say, "Let's have free trade for the farmer first and for all later on."

We have witnessed during the debate on this feature of the bill a most remarkable variety of excuses and apologies. By some it is averred that the cost of living should be reduced, and that this reduction will come from competition of Canadian products with the products of American farmers. Others glide quickly over this phase of the question, and with labored effort seek to show that it will not affect the farmer. It is interesting to listen to the gentlemen from our large centers, whose knowledge of agriculture comes chiefly from looking through the windows of Pullman palace cars, speeding 60 miles an hour, discuss farming. Some, indeed, like the gentleman who is said to have conducted the negotiations with Canada—I refer to Mr. Pepper, whose contribution on the subject was presented as a Senate document—have the temerity to affirm that it will benefit the farmer.

Not only is this measure inconsistent with the protective policy for which our party has stood in the past, but it is in direct contravention of our last national platform and the recent definitely announced policy of our party, both on the part of our President and the Republican side of Congress. We have created a Tariff Board for the purpose of securing information as a basis of applying the measure of protection announced in our last national platform—the difference in cost of production at home and abroad. A partial report has been submitted. It includes the conditions in Canada and in this country on this very subject. It shows a difference in cost of production of farm products in Canada and the United States. It shows conclusively a difference in the price of farm products in the two countries. And yet it is absolutely ignored. I am one of those who have believed and still believe in a tariff board that will investigate and report the facts for the information of Congress. We have an able board, a board that has the confidence of all, and yet it is proposed to proceed headlong, without giving its report any consideration whatever. I protest against such action.

I was much impressed by the description of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS] of the decadence of New England farming between the years 1860–1890. It recalled to my mind a conversation I had with a gentleman in my own State just a few months ago. He was born and passed his boyhood days on a New England farm and then joined the movement westward, locating in Iowa. As the evening shadows of life approached, his mind wandered back to the old home and he longed to return once more to the environments of his childhood days. At last he went back, and getting off at the station, his heart full of tender memories as he drew near to the sacred scenes of those early days, with the pictured faces of loved ones before him, started for the old home; and I shall never forget the touching pathos with which he told how he was unable even to find the spot. Decadence had done its work. The farm, the home, was no more. Nothing but desolation. Sadly he turned his face again to the West. That is what competition with the new soil of the West did to the agriculture of New England. What will that vast empire of new and fertile land in western Canada do to our Middle West if thrown into free competition? I am here to protect the interests of our American farmers and leave solicitude for Canadian farmers to Canadian representatives. [Applause.]

The movement of rural population has always followed the opening up of new soil. You can go back in the history of our own country and trace the movement from New England westward. There is a reason for it. Old soil can not compete with new soil on an equal basis. The cost of production is less on new soil than on old soil. With the use of soil comes the necessity for rotation of crops, for fertilizing, putting back into the soil that which is taken out. This is a material element of cost. The deserted farms of New England, as well as other Eastern States, until recent years tell the story. Right across the Potomac, in Virginia, within sight of our own eyes was once a thriving agricultural section. To-day the country is flooded with literature telling of Virginia farms that can be purchased for less than the value of the improvements—beautiful homes standing tenantless. In recent years, since farm prices have become remunerative, there has been a movement to reclaim the abandoned farms of New England and of Virginia and other places, but if the prices of farm products are not maintained at a relatively remunerative figure this movement will stop. I am in favor of conserving our own lands.

The movement that has taken place in this country has been followed, to some extent, in the movement to western Canada, but it will be greatly emphasized if this measure becomes a law. Fortunately I come from a section of the country that has some knowledge of Canada. We know that the farmers of the West have been lured to Canada by the cheapness of her lands. The friends and neighbors and relatives of our people have journeyed there; some have remained, others have invested. In nearly every town in our State will be found real estate agents advertising Canadian lands. In brief, our people know something about the subject.

If this measure passes, the movement to Canada will be greatly increased. It is admitted that already its influence is being felt. I am not in favor of encouraging emigration from this country to Canada. We need the sturdy farmers of this country; we can not afford to lose them. We want to populate our own soil, intensify our farming, make rural life attractive, and encourage in every fair and legitimate way our agricultural resources. We should not ignore the very basis of our prosperity.

It seems to me superfluous to discuss the proposition that $150 per acre land can not compete with land at from $10 to $25 per acre with equal fertility. The report of the Tariff Board gives the average value per acre of improved land in Iowa in 1910 as $109, in Alberta, $20; in Saskatchewan, $22; Manitoba, $29.

What makes the difference in the value of land? Not soil alone. The character and fertility of soil is, of course, important, but there are other considerations. The settled state of the country brings educational advantages. Schools are maintained where the boys and girls can obtain an education. This affects the value of land. Some of the greatest statesmen of our country and captains of industry and finance began their education in the country school. Every farmer believes in education. Proximity to places of worship and churches also affects the value of land.

Then there is a social value to land—the communal spirit of the neighborhood; opportunity for exchanging visits; forming friendships; the advantages of associations of a social, political, agricultural, religious, fraternal, or other nature; all promoted by the incidents of a settled country, such as good roads, telephones, free rural mail service, railway and interurban service, easy access to numerous cities and towns. Again, there is the question of market accessibility, both for buying and selling.

All of these affect the value of land just as they affect the value of real estate, either business or residential, in the city. The land itself may not be any better or may not be more fertile or more productive per acre than land that does not have these advantages and the value of which is far less. Our lands have this value; the lands of northwestern Canada do not. The farmers there are pioneering, just as our farmers did years ago. Our farmers have helped to develop our country and have contributed their share in payment of these advantages which now give to their land its present value. Is it fair, is it just, is it defensible to place them in open competition as to their products wth the Canadian farmer, with his new and fertile soil and cheap land?

I will insert in the RECORD a table which I prepared showing the average yield per acre in the United States and in Iowa and in Canada of various farm products in the year 1909. The figures in this table are taken from the Canadian yearbook of 1909 and the Yearbook of the Department of Agriculture of the United States for 1909:

	Iowa.	United States.	Canada.
Wheat.....bushels..	17.00	15.80	21.51
Oats.....do....	27.00	30.30	38.00
Barley.....do....	22.00	24.30	29.71
Rye.....do....	17.80	16.10	18.78
Buckwheat.....do....	15.00	20.90	27.64
Potatoes.....do....	89.00	106.80	192.96
Hay.....tons..	1.64	1.42	1.44
Flax.....bushels..	9.80	9.40	15.98

It will be noted from these tables that in the articles enumerated the average yield per acre is greater in Canada than in the United States, or even in Iowa, which we think is the best farming State in the Union.

I shall not stop to discuss the question of prices; that there is a difference between the price of farm products in Canada and in the United States can not be successfully controverted; that Canada is already a large exporter of farm products is true, and that her exports will increase is equally true. How can it benefit our farmers to throw her surplus agricultural products into American markets? But they say the price of farm products is fixed in Liverpool, and the old delusion of the markets of the world has been resurrected during this debate. No one has yet reconciled this argument with the difference in price that obtains in towns along the Canadian border. Take Portal, N. Dak., and North Portal, Canada, a street dividing the two, where, as the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HANNA] has pointed out, there is a marked difference in the price of wheat, barley, flax, and other products raised in the same community, on the same soil, with the same transportation facilities—just a narrow strip of 80 feet dividing the two. The farmers of this country know the difference between a home market for the substantial part of their products and shipping them to the seacoast, and then 3,000 miles across the sea to be sold to the underpaid labor of London and Liverpool. Canada knows the same thing. If not, why has she been knocking at our door for half a century to get into our markets? She realizes their value, even if some of the gentlemen on this floor do not.

There is one point to which I wish to direct attention before it escapes me. I want to say to the Democratic Members from the North who represent agricultural districts that you will have a hard time explaining to your constituents why you voted for free trade on all the products of the farmer of the North, while the farmers of the South, where the control of your party lies, retain protection on their principal products, such as rice, tobacco, cotton, sugar, and other things. I do not wish to draw sectional differences into this debate, but I shall not sit silently by and permit such discriminatory legislation to be passed without a protest.

Returning after this digression, I will refer briefly to the policy of the provincial governments of Canada in subsidizing their agricultural interests. In the reports of our Consular Service in Canada, in the Daily Consular and Trade Report, are found frequent mention of the steps taken in this direction. The Canadian Provinces, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, are establishing grain elevators. The same Provinces, as well as others, are also subsidizing the dairy industry through Government creameries, and, in addition, farmers living at a distance from a creamery can ship their cream without cost—that is to say, the express charges are paid. Consul General John E. Jones, of Winnipeg, Canada, in a report of recent date, tells of the impetus given to the industry. I read as follows:

> The records show that before the creamery was opened, in 1908, dairy butter was worth 12½ cents in trade; from July 1 to the end of October the lowest price the Government paid was 21½ cents and the highest price 31½ cents per pound of butter fat. This was cash and the payments were made twice a month.

Can anyone doubt what will be the result, so far as the production in Canada is concerned, with the aid of Government subsidy? Can our farmers compete with the cheap lands of Canada aided by Government subsidy? Is it fair that we should expect them to?

This is not a new policy for Canada. She did the same thing for the cheese industry, which developed until Canada is one of the great cheese-producing countries of the world. In 1909 Canada exported to Great Britain alone 164,090,903 pounds of cheese.

Already Canada is exporting butter. Her export of butter to Great Britain in 1909 was 5,353,770 pounds. Will it not be just as easy to develop the dairy industry in Canada through Government subsidy as it has the cheese industry? To my mind, easier.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. From whom does the Canadian Government get the funds with which they are subsidizing these farmers?

Mr. PICKETT. I do not know. I suppose they get them from the people; but that is immaterial on this point.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I just wanted to know from curiosity.

Mr. PICKETT. It is immaterial to the question so long as they do it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. They tax the farmer to get it, do they not?

Mr. PICKETT. I do not know as to that. I am not familiar with the taxing laws of Canada, but understand the taxes on farmers are very low.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I would like to know one other thing. You spoke a moment ago about certain people not being affected by this Canadian reciprocity while the northern farmer was affected by having his protective tariff stricken down. As a compensation for that the Canadian tariff against the northern farmer is also stricken down, is it not?

Mr. PICKETT. Oh, yes; but we are not exporting northern farm products into Canada in any considerable amount.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is there not as much benefit in the one as there is injury in the other?

Mr. PICKETT. There certainly is not. If the percentage in the increase of Canadian production of farm products continues for the next 15 years as it has in the past 8 years, and the same increase obtains in this country as in the past 8 years, the production of Canada will equal the production of the United States in practically all farm products except corn. Canada has a population of less than 8,000,000, while our population is over 90,000,000; therefore her surplus will increase in much greater proportion.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. We now produce a surplus, and so does Canada, and will not our exports and hers go to the same foreign market?

Mr. PICKETT. That is the difference between the policy of the gentleman's party and mine. We have been trying for 50 years to build up a home market that will consume the products of the farm [applause on the Republican side], and now that we are reaching that point you propose to destroy the home market by putting the farmer in free competition with other countries. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PICKETT. Certainly.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is it not essential to the welfare of the American farmer that he should be able to reach out and grasp the foreign market for his surplus, and is it not true that the commercial greatness of this country is due to the fact that the American farmer produces a large surplus and sends it abroad? Now, does the gentleman say that we ought to limit the production of the farmers of the United States to home consumption?

Mr. PICKETT. The gentleman does not understand me. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PICKETT. Certainly.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman from Iowa state, if he knows, how many farmers have left the States in the last 10 years and gone to Manitoba?

Mr. PICKETT. I do not know that I can answer the gentleman. I have no figures as to Manitoba alone. I have seen a statement that some 400,000 Americans have removed to Canada within the past five years. The Canadian Government shows that 72,349 settlers came from the United States to Canada during the year 1909. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] calls my attention to an article in Hampton's Magazine, which states that 500,000 Americans have passed over to Canada during the last nine years.

Mr. SWITZER. Will the gentleman from Iowa state how many stayed in Canada?

Mr. PICKETT. I do not have the statistics showing that fact, but the development of western Canada is largely from this country.

Just a word relative to the importation of Canadian cattle. An attempt has been made to show that this bill will benefit our farmers, and before I forget it I want to refer to the remarkable contribution given us on this subject by Mr. Pepper, which, as I have already stated, was ordered printed as a document by the Senate. The gentleman's name does not appear on the document as the author of the article. However, in another publication since issued he is given credit for it. I read from the subdivision of the article entitled "Where the Canadian reciprocity agreement benefits the farmer." It will be recalled that Mr. Pepper was one of the commissioners who were sent to Canada for the purpose of conducting the negotiations which resulted in this agreement. As a fair sample of the fairness with which he discusses the matter, I read from his article as follows:

> The sheep raisers of the United States will be materially benefited by getting their sheep into Canada free. The Dominion, through its department of agriculture, is now taking means to increase the Canadian supply of sheep. Under the present tariff of 25 per cent, sheep to the value of $220,000 imported into Canada from the United States have paid duties in excess of $55,000.

For the year ending March 31, 1910, the United States shipped to Canada 35,844 sheep, of the value of $131,492, with a tariff levied of $32,873; at least, these are the figures submitted by the President in the tables attached to his message. Just where Mr. Pepper secured his figures does not appear. However, he omitted to state that during the same year Canada shipped into the United States 103,519 sheep of the value of $527,687, on which the United States collected a duty of $103,519. Mr. Pepper's statement justifies the application of the old adage of Benjamin Franklin, that "half the truth is often a great lie." [Applause.]

Mr. Pepper also seems to think, and the same argument has been adduced by others, that our farmers will be benefited by the free importation of cattle from Canada.

I do not have the figures on cattle alone, but the Canadian Yearbook tells us that for the year 1909 Canada exported over $51,000,000 of animals and their produce, of which only about $7,000,000 came to the United States. While on this subject, there is another point to which I desire to allude, and that is the treaty entered into between Canada and France just a few years since. The draft of the treaty as originally submitted provided for the import into France at the minimum duty of cattle fattened for slaughter. The French Senate refused to ratify the convention unless cattle fattened for slaughter were excluded, and to this Canada finally acceded. The purpose was to protect the meat-producing interests of France. In brief, the French farmer could replenish his herds for dairy, breeding, or other purposes, but would be protected from competition as to fattened cattle. Will some one tell me why our Government should be less concerned in the protection of the meat producers of this country than the French Government was for the farmers of France? In the one case 3,000 miles of ocean divided the competitors, while in the case before us is the imaginary line we have heard so much about.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the exhaustive debate that has already taken place on this branch of the subject, I will not consume any more time in a further discussion of it.

WHAT DOES CANADA GIVE US?—IOWA—OUR MANUFACTURERS NOT GIVEN ACCESS TO CANADIAN MARKETS—CANADA'S INTERNAL POLICY AN IMPORTANT CONSIDERATION—OTHER COUNTRIES SECURE SAME CONCESSIONS GRATUITOUSLY.

I now turn to another phase of the subject that bears directly on the question of reciprocity. The debate thus far has been confined almost wholly to the effect on the people of this country of the free importation from Canada of agricultural products. The question of what we are getting in exchange has not been discussed. So far as the free admission of Canadian products is concerned, that could be covered by our own legislation, without respect to Canada or the concurrence of Canada therein. Of course Canada would be glad to have the tariff duties removed from all Canadian articles. If the agreement is to be sustained on the theory that it is reciprocal, then we should look to the concessions granted to us by Canada, and this phase of the subject, as I have suggested, has received little, if any, consideration during the debate. While Iowa is an agricultural State, and I regard agriculture as the basis of our prosperity, it is also true that we are developing along industrial lines, and the people of Iowa of all classes, both urban and rural, are beginning to realize the importance of the dual development. Our farmers realize the value of having a better market near their farms, and, on the other hand, our manufacturers realize the importance of the prosperity of the farmers and are interested in promoting agricultural development. The "booster" spirit is abroad in our State. A movement has been inaugurated for the cooperation of our industrial and agricultural interests. "Booster" meetings are being held, and during the recent session of our legislature a law was placed on the statute books providing an official trademark for Iowa goods—"Made in Iowa." "Iowa goods for Iowa people" is the slogan. I am deeply interested, as a citizen of the State, in this movement. I also believe in the same principle for our Nation.

Iowa is strategically located for the manufacture of many articles, and especially of agricultural implements, and this is particularly true so far as the market of western Canada is concerned. Our manufacturers of the Middle West are as accessible to Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta as are the eastern portions of Canada; and if given access to that section of Canada where great agricultural development will take place, we would undoubtedly rapidly develop the manufacture of agricultural implements.

It has been held out that we are given access to Canadian markets, particularly as to agricultural implements, "on advantageous terms." This, if true, would be in accord with the theory of reciprocity, for if we open our markets to Canada for practically all Canada wants—that is, our markets for her farm products—then we in turn should be compensated therefor by access to Canadian markets.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. In that connection, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. PICKETT. Certainly.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The gentleman said that all Canada wanted in our markets was to find a market for her agricultural products. Does the gentleman think Canada would be averse to selling her timber products in this country, and does the gentleman not really think that to get her lumber and wood pulp and paper here is the moving cause for this treaty? Would that not benefit these very farmers in Iowa that the gentleman is talking about—give them cheaper lumber with which to build their barns?

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri has apparently been giving his attention to other things rather than an examination of the facts relative to this subject. With reference to the desire of Canada to give to our country the products of her forests, I remind the gentleman that the various Provinces of Canada impose an export tax on logs, so that we do not get her forest products unrestricted. The Canadian Government, as its representatives point out in their correspondence with our Secretary of State, have "no power and no desire" to interfere with the Provinces in respect to these restrictions, speaking with special reference to pulp, printing paper, etc. I have here a recent report, dated March 24, 1911, from the consul at Owen Sound, Ontario, who reports as follows:

> There is $3,550,000 capital invested in sawmill plants and the equipments necessary to convert the standing timber into lumber. That as much more is invested by each company in timber and lumber land is a fair estimate. This would make the total investment of American capital $7,100,000 in the lumber industry in this part of Ontario. This investment of American capital is largely due to the export duty on Canadian logs. Before the duty was put on the logs were rafted to the American side and then manufactured into lumber, but after that went into force the American firms were obliged to do the manufacturing on Canadian soil so as to save the export duty on their product.

This same condition exists throughout Canada, and if, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] suggests, Canada is so anxious to unload the products of her forests on us, why does she not adjust her internal laws so as to permit it?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. In that connection I will say that in five fiscal years Canada shipped into this country $98,000,000 of lumber more than we shipped up there.

Mr. PICKETT. That may be true; but under their internal laws they have forced American capital into Canada, for the purpose of manufacturing the lumber. There is no question about that.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If our tariff had not been against it they would have shipped very much more lumber here.

Mr. PICKETT. That may be true. I voted for a reduction of the duty on lumber during the last Congress, when the Payne bill was being considered, and the reduction would have prevailed if it had received the support of the Democratic Members of the House.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. We will be prepared for it once more, and on this agreement too.

Mr. PICKETT. Not under this agreement.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. No; but we will get lumber on the free list sure.

Mr. PICKETT. You do not propose it in the present agreement. Rough lumber is on the free list, but farmers do not use rough lumber.

I was speaking on the question of the access given under this agreement to our manufacturers of agricultural implements in Canadian markets. I discussed this question in the last Congress and do not desire to cover the same phase of it again. I will, however, summarize what I then said. I stated that there is no material concession given to our manufacturers of agricultural implements. On a number of more important articles, like traction, portable, and gasoline engines, manure spreaders, pumps, and windmills, there is no reduction in the Canadian duty. As to some others, there is a reduction of 2½ points, and on others of 5 points; the lowest Canadian duty is 15 per cent, and ranging from that up to 30 per cent, and if it be true, as advocates of this measure urge, that there is no substantial difference in the cost of manufacturing in Canada and this country, then it would follow that these concessions are immaterial, and certainly can not be claimed as an equivalent consideration for the concessions which we have given to Canada.

When I addressed the House on this question during the last Congress I referred to the construction given to the favored-nation clause by other countries, and that under such construction Canada would be compelled to give to every country with whom she has such a treaty the same concessions given to the United States under this agreement and without any equivalent consideration therefor. That is to say, gratuitously. It will be recalled that this very question was raised by Mr. Blaine and by President Harrison, from whom I have quoted. The statement which I made at that time was questioned. It is, however, no longer in doubt. It has been eliminated from controversy by a very valuable contribution on Tariff Relations with Canada, by Mr. Frank R. Rutter, tariff expert of the Department of Commerce and Labor, and published by said department as Tariff Series No. 26, from which I now quote:

> The commercial relations of Canada with various countries are based, in part, on unconditional most-favored-nation treatment, in part on special commercial agreements, and, in respect to imports from the United Kingdom and British possessions, on preferential treatment which is not applicable to imports from any foreign country. By virtue of the most-favored-nation clause in a number of British treaties which are applicable to the colonies, every concession in duty to any foreign country is immediately extended to the favored nations. To this group of countries all of the concessions made to France by the 1907 convention were at once granted, and a provision to the same effect is contained in the resolution introduced by the Canadian minister of finance on January 26, 1911, in the case of any reductions in duty to be accorded imports from the United States.

Mr. Rutter then proceeds to name the countries that will receive the same concessions as the United States and without any consideration therefor. The countries are Argentina, Austria-Hungary, Bolivia, Colombia, Denmark, Japan, Norway, Russia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, and Venezuela. He also names the colonies that will be entitled to the British preferential: Bermuda, British West Indies, British Guiana, British India, Ceylon, Straits Settlements, New Zealand, Union of South Africa, Southern Rhodesia, and other British colonies.

Further, that France, Algeria, and French colonies will receive the lowest rate applicable to articles specified in the Franco-Canadian convention from any foreign country, and that Belgium and Netherlands the rates of intermediate tariff, but not special rates on all articles specified in Franco-Canadian convention.

So that it is now settled beyond controversy that the United States will receive no favored treatment in Canadian markets, but, on the contrary, our country will purchase for all these other countries the same concessions accorded to us and the United States will be entitled to the privilege of meeting the competition of these other countries in Canadian markets.

I will now turn for a few moments to the internal policy of Canada under which Canada has absolute power to render ineffective the concessions granted under the agreement. Thus far in the debate no reference has been made to the Canadian patent laws, to my mind a very material consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield 15 minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. PICKETT. I now read from the patent act of Canada, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906:

> 38. Every patent shall, unless otherwise ordered by the commissioner as hereinafter provided, be subject, and expressed to be subject, to the following conditions:
> (a) Such patent and all the rights and privileges thereby granted shall cease and determine, and the patent shall be null and void at the end of two years from the date thereof, unless the patentee or his legal representatives, within that period or an authorized extension thereof, commence, and after such commencement, continuously carry on in Canada the construction or manufacture of the invention patented in such a manner that any person desiring to use it may obtain it, or cause it to be made for him at a reasonable price, at some manufactory or establishment for making or constructing it in Canada.
> (b) If, after the expiration of 12 months from the granting of a patent, or an authorized extension of such period, the patentee or patentees, or any of them or his or their or any of their legal representatives, for the whole or a part of his or their or any of their interest in the patent, import or cause to be imported into Canada the invention for which the patent is granted, such patent shall be void as to the interest of the person or persons so importing or causing to be imported.

Canada uses her patent laws for the purpose of protecting her industries, encouraging their development, and securing new industries. Under her patent laws she is able to force American inventors who secure Canadian patents either to sell their patents or manufacture the articles in Canada. To what extent this has been done I can not definitely state. It is a matter of such importance, however, and of such materiality to this agreement that it is strange the State Department has not investigated it thoroughly and given us information thereon. I do know that a number of manufacturing establishments in my State have been compelled to build branch factories in Canada in order to sell in Canadian markets. I hold in my hand letters from gentlemen representing two separate manufacturing establishments in Iowa, each of which has a branch factory in Canada, stating in substance that they were forced to establish their branch factories in Canada because of the Canadian patent laws. I know the same thing to be true of other manufacturing establishments in my State, and the same condition will be found, I am informed, in many other States.

The reports of our consuls found in the Daily Consular and Trade Reports tell the story of American capital being brought into Canada in the construction of branch factories. In a recent report it is stated that 184 American factories have established branches in Canada, with an estimated capital of $233,000,000. I do not say that all of them have been compelled to do so by virtue of the patent laws of Canada; I affirm, however, that it is true of many. It seems to me that it is a proper matter to be considered and carefully weighed in approving this proposed trade agreement. If we are to enter into an agreement with Canada under which certain concessions are granted, it is our duty to see that the contract will be effective. What avail the agreement even as to the slight reductions given, when Canada, under her patent laws, can render the concessions absolutely ineffective and can require our manufacturers holding Canadian patents either to sell them or to send their money to Canada for the purpose of manufacturing there?

There is another interesting law in Canada, known as the "dumping clause" of their tariff law, which is as follows:

CUSTOMS TARIFF, 1907.

6. In the case of articles exported to Canada of a class or kind made or produced in Canada, if the export or actual selling price to an importer in Canada be less than the fair market value of the same article when sold for home consumption in the usual and ordinary course in the country whence exported to Canada at the time of its exportation to Canada there shall, in addition to the duties otherwise established, be levied, collected, and paid on such article, on its importation into Canada, a special duty (or dumping duty) equal to the difference between the said selling price of the article for export and the said fair market value thereof for home consumption; and such special duty (or dumping duty) shall be levied, collected, and paid on such article, although it is not otherwise dutiable.

While I do not have time to discuss it, it will be seen that it provides another method by which Canada can protect her industries, and it is susceptible of such administration.

I have called attention to these matters for the reason that they seem to me to be materially related to the question of the consideration the United States is receiving from Canada. Even though the consideration be slight, it should be made effective. How can we justify approving a contract without doing so?

RELATIVE TRADE CONDITIONS.

There is still another phase of the subject to which I desire to allude if this agreement is to be considered from the standpoint of reciprocity. Attached to the special message of the President to Congress on January 26, 1911, and on page 70 thereof, is a table containing an analysis of the import, export, and total trade of Canada by countries, showing that the entire trade of Canada was $655,800,567 for the fiscal year 1910, of which the United States furnished $327,701,484; that the import trade of Canada was, in round numbers, $375,833,016, of which the importations from the United States were $223,501,809; that the export trade of Canada was $279,247,551, of which $104,199,675 was to the United States. These figures of course include the entire trade of Canada without respect to the articles included within the proposed agreement.

For the proper consideration of this agreement, however, the figures pertaining solely to the articles included within the agreement should have been furnished. Fortunately the bulletin to which I have heretofore referred, entitled "Trade relations of Canada," covers this subject. It appears that of the articles included in the agreement more than 80 per cent of the entire Canadian imports come from the United States. The total imports of the articles included in the agreement for the year ending March 31, 1910, were $41,072,185, of which the imports from the United States were $32,913,823, or, as I have stated, 80 per cent, so that of the articles included within this agreement there remains only $8,158,362 as a possible market in Canada for the United States, and of this there is only the small amount of $683,225 that is not included in the importations from Great Britain and her colonies which have a preferential and the countries with which Canada has a favored-nation-clause treaty.

The Canadian commissioners were shrewd enough in drafting the agreement to include the articles which would not affect her own markets or her own interests. I have here a British document, with tabulations on the subject, which also gives the importation of articles included in the agreement into the United States. The figures are in thousand pounds, and for the purpose of reducing the figures I have used $5 for the pound. The table shows that of articles included in the agreement the total imports into the United States were $101,415,000, of which the imports from Canada were $34,280,000, leaving a possible increase for Canada of $67,135,000, as against a possible increased trade of the United States with Canada, as above stated, of $8,158,362. Canada, however, will have favored treatment as to these articles in our country, while the United States will not have favored treatment in the markets of Canada.

I will insert in the RECORD tables showing the foregoing facts. The table showing the imports into Canada of articles included in the agreement I take from the bulletin issued by the Department of Commerce and Labor, and the table showing the imports into the United States of the articles covered by the agreement I take from the British tabulation, reduced from pounds to dollars on the basis of $5 per pound:

Table showing imports into Canada of articles covered by the agreement and also total imports for the year ending March 31, 1910.

Imports into Canada from—	Total imports covered by agreement.	Total of all imports.
United States	$32,913,823	$223,501,809
Great Britain	6,394,638	95,350,200
British colonies	290,510	16,448,117
Most-favored nations	789,989	10,275,506
Other countries	683,225	30,257,284
	41,072,185	375,833,016

Table showing imports into the United States of articles covered by the proposed reciprocity agreement both from Canada and from all countries.

	From Canada.	From all countries including Canada.
Articles already free to all countries	$2,535,000	$3,945,000
Dutiable articles on which the rate of duty is unchanged	35,000	45,000
Dutiable articles now made free to Canada	25,915,000	60,565,000
Dutiable articles now dutiable at lower rates to Canada	5,795,000	36,860,000
Total United States imports included under the agreement	34,280,000	101,415,000

The more you examine the agreement the more apparent it becomes that Mr. Fielding was right when he stated to the House of Commons of Canada that they had gained everything they desired, free access to our markets, "without doing any injustice to our manufacturers." I am unable after a careful examination to find wherein the agreement can by any fair construction be termed a reciprocity agreement. It can not be sustained on that theory. No one has attempted to point out what Canada grants the United States, and I challenge anyone to show where our people are given any favorable concession in Canadian markets. The agreement inures wholly to the benefit of Canada. It is unilateral. It should be entitled, as Senator Chandler observed of the treaty of 1854, an act "to encourage emigration from the United States to Canada and to encourage production in Canada instead of the United States."

It is not reciprocal. You do violence to the term to call it so. It is in direct contravention of the express declaration of our last Republican national platform, that we are in favor of a protection that will measure the difference in the cost of production at home and abroad. It is a repudiation of the principle and purpose of the Tariff Board, whose findings are ignored. It is repugnant to the spirit of our institutions which demands that legislation should be applicable and equitable to all classes alike.

Mr. Chairman, mindful of the interests of the people whom I have the honor to represent, and as well the interests of all the people of our country, I can not give my sanction to this measure. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, the attacks of the Republican dissidents, upon the reciprocity pact, recoil upon their own heads. This is neither a Democratic concept, nor the outcome of a Democratic conference, but is the favorite child of a Republican Executive, who has assembled the Congress in an extraordinary session, in order that a Republican Senate may have another opportunity to put itself in line with the action of the last Republican House. If this agreement is an attack upon the citadel of protection, it is an attack conceived and delivered by the leader of the Republican Party, the man who was elected amid the hurrahs of the standpatters, and the enthusiastic acclaim of the tariff barons.

This measure is not a measure of free trade, unless our Republican friends are willing to admit that their President has become a free trader. The frenzied standpatters assert that reciprocity is a spear thrust into the vitals of protection. If so, go further, and charge that the titular head of your organization is a traitor to the chief tenet of your party faith. This measure is not a cunningly contrived attack upon prosperity, unless such a criticism can be justly directed against the recommendation of a Republican President, who was elected for the alleged purpose of conserving prosperity against the machinations of Democratic conspirators, fatally bent on mischief. So at least, we were informed by various Republican spellbinders, patriotically engaged in saving the country, in the Bryan-Taft campaign of 1908.

If this is free trade, it is Republican free trade, for the President approves it, and insists that his party followers shall indorse his attitude.

If this pact imperils the interests of the farmers, as asserted by its stand-pat opponents, ascribe the responsibility to a Republican administration, and to the Republican Executive who negotiated the agreement with Canada.

Truly Canadian reciprocity is a pent-up Utica, which confines the vituperative powers of our Republican friends within the narrow limits of a temperate, and chastened criticism. It is well that it is a product of Republican statesmanship, and is stamped with the stamp of Executive approbation. Otherwise a copious flow of barbed invective, and bitter vituperation, would be directed against its authors. I sympathize with my Republican friends. They have long misrepresented the Democratic attitude on the tariff, and in terms of general denunciation, assailed every suggestion of tariff reduction, or reciprocal trade, as a menace to prosperity, thus avoiding any discussion of policies on their merits, and befogging the public mind to such an extent, that many sincere and serious Americans have earnestly believed, that in some mysterious and inexplicable, but sufficient fashion, the Republican Party, through its attitude on the tariff, was the country's rock of defense against the economic heresies of the Democrats. But at last, the party of protection, as it is fond of acclaiming itself, is confronted with a dread and awful dilemma. Reciprocity is a measure of tariff reduction. If they approve this pact, and accept this reduction, and the change works well, then they will be plagued by schemes of further reduction. But if they reject the reciprocity pact, or amend it so as to compass its defeat, then they reject and flout their President, who was elected to afford a safe and sane administration, and to furnish policies that would be enthusiastically approved, and blindly followed. Unhappy followers! Unhappy leader! Approve his policies, and you discredit yourselves. Discredit his policies, and you discredit your leader.

If this bill is treason to your party, your President is the traitor. He has inaugurated this movement, nay, pressed it upon the country with superlative vigor, and incredible pertinacity. Your plight is pitiable, your predicament distressing. At last the mills of retribution are grinding you, and the grinding is exceeding fine. But sharper than a serpent's tooth, is the reflection that the author of this measure which you so bitterly assail, is not some wild-eyed Democrat, but one of your household and party faith, your own familiar friend, whom you profess to admire as a man, but reject as a leader. Others before you have been the authors of their own misfortunes, and in the bitterness of your present reflections, prostrate under the stroke directed by the President whom you aided to elevate to his high position, perchance you may recall the lines:

> So the struck eagle, stretched upon the plain,
> No more through rolling clouds, to soar again,
> Viewed his own feather on the fatal dart,
> And winged the shaft, that quivered in his heart:
> Keen were his pangs, but keener far to feel,
> He nursed the pinion, that impelled the steel:
> While the same plumage that had warmed his nest,
> Drank the last life-drop, from his bleeding breast.

I have said that this is a Republican, not a Democratic proposition. The statement is correct. From the first to the last word, it was conceived in secret conference between President Taft, and his party advisers, on the one hand, and the representatives of Canada on the other. In its final form, the President sent it to Congress with his emphatic imprimatur. He has never disowned his child. On the contrary he is proud of its paternity. Some of the Republican standpatters, the Old Guard, which is now engaged in dying, as a preferable alternative to surrender, are seeking to repudiate reciprocity. Vain task! The Republican Party is a house divided against itself. It must fall. On the one hand, ex-Speaker CANNON, Mr. DALZELL, Mr. FORDNEY and their following, representative, as they claim, of Republicanism pure and undefiled, are vociferating against the bill as un-Republican, and un-American. But in its defense is found the President, the balance wheel of the Republican organization, the man to whom the trusts turned in their extremity two years ago, as a sane and safe leader, the antithesis, in all respects, of his predecessor. Standing with him, are our friends, HILL of Connecticut, MCCALL of Massachusetts, and many others, all sturdy Republicans, who unite in saying that if the terms of this agreement are enacted into law—

It will be in full accord with the practices of the Republican Party in the past, and with the provisions of the national Republican platform at the present time.

So that whatever this reciprocity pact may be, we must view it as a proposition of purely Republican antecedents, which challenges attention, and invokes consideration on its merits. If on the whole, it is mischievous and dangerous, it should be rejected.

But it should be given a respectful hearing, and President Taft and his followers should be afforded the opportunity to make good, in the forum of free discussion. The parentage of the measure compels the standpatters to exercise a repression of utterance which must be most painful to them. To that extent it is a restraint upon free speech. Criticism of its alleged demerits, have come, and will continue to come, from standpat speakers, but they have been, and will be, remarkable for their moderation. A reproduction of what these gentlemen would like to say, if unrestrained by the exigencies of the situation, would be interesting, if lurid reading.

But the embarrassment of our friends, is the opportunity of the Democrats. Tariff reduction, in concrete form, when urged by Democrats, is one thing. Tariff reduction in the guise of reciprocity, urged by the President, is quite another and different thing, in respect of the treatment that it will receive from the standpatters and the country. The one may be whistled down the winds by interested partisans, or dismissed with contemptuous comment, as merely another illustration of Democratic vagaries, but the other compels the whole tribe to sit up, and take notice. The cry of wolf will no longer serve. They must produce the wolf. In this time of popular discontent with the present conditions, the President has been quick to perceive that the old-fashioned shibboleths of the Republican Party, will no longer suffice to carry his party to victory. If it is vain to say peace, when there is no peace, and war is flagrant, it is equally vain for the standpatters to seek to stay the growing movement for cheaper living, within the Republican Party, by vociferous claims that all is well in the land. For years the standpatters have pursued the attitude of misrepresenting their political adversaries, and terrifying a timid public, by clamorously asserting that the policies of our party threatened disaster. But it is not so easy to apply this rough and ready method to the recommendations of the President. If his suggested policies spell danger to the national welfare, his opponents must point out that danger by sufficient, and dispassionate analysis of his recommendations. As against attacks from the members of his own household, the President is in a position to enter a general denial, and call for proofs. In this attitude he will be supported by the country.

Now for the evidence of record, to determine who is responsible for the reciprocity pact. In his annual message of December 6, 1910, and in his special message of later date, President Taft writes as follows:

By my direction the Secretary of State, dispatched two representatives of the Department of State to Ottawa, to confer with representatives of the Dominion Government. These commissioners were authorized to take steps to formulate a reciprocal trade agreement, and the Ottawa conferences thus begun, were adjourned, and resumed later in Washington. In the month of January two cabinet ministers came to Washington, as representatives of the Dominion Government, and the conferences were continued between them, and the Secretary of State. The result of the negotiations was, that on January 21, a reciprocal trade agreement was reached, the text of which is herewith transmitted, with accompanying correspondence, and other data.

So much for the genesis and responsibility for this famous agreement. Many reckless statements, and much misleading matter have been made, and circulated by interested parties as to the effect of this agreement. Hence the confusion in a portion of the public mind, which does not discriminate between trade with the people of Canada, a like people, living in a like climate to ours, under substantially similar conditions, and free trade with the world. What does the President say in this connection:

It is known of all men that the general conditions that prevail in Canada, are the same as those which obtain in the United States in the matter of agricultural products. It is said that reciprocity will injure the farmers. I deny it.

A man who has anything to sell, is on the lookout for a good customer. The United States has many things to sell. She is seeking markets, and customers the world over. Our neighbor of the snows is a prosperous, progressive, wide-awake, Anglo-Saxon country. She has many things to sell that we need. This country has many things that we desire Canada to buy. Under these conditions a rapprochement between the two countries was inevitable, looking to the establishment of mutually profitable commercial arrangements. In this connection, the President says:

A reciprocal trade agreement is a logical sequence of all that has been accomplished in disposing of matters of a diplomatic, and controversial character. The identity of interests of two peoples, linked together by race, language, political institutions, and geographical proximity, offers the foundation. The guiding motive in seeking adjustment of trade relations between two countries so situated geographically, should be to give play to productive forces as far as practicable, regardless of political boundaries. No yardstick can measure the benefits to the two peoples, of this commercial intercourse. We have reached a stage in our development, that calls for a broad and statesmanlike view of our future economic status, and its requirements. Excluding cotton, which is exceptional, a radical change is already shown in our exports, in the falling off of the amount of our agricultural products sold abroad. A far-sighted policy, requires that if we can enlarge the supply of our natural resources, and especially of food products, and necessities of life, without substantial injury to any of our producing, and manufacturing classes, we should take steps to do so now. We have on the north of us a country contiguous to ours for 3,000 miles, with natural resources of the same character as ours, and in the development of which, the conditions as to wages, and the character of the wage earner, and transportation to market, differ but little from those prevailing with us.

This is a calm and dispassionate statement of essential facts, and it is difficult for the alarmist to find a just occasion of terror in these recitals.

Another citation from the message will be of interest, in view of the fact, that the Republicans who are fighting the policy of their own President, are seeking to place the reciprocity pact before the country in a false light, boldly asserting that it commits this country to universal free trade. Nothing of the sort. It is that form of reciprocal trade, limited to the contracting countries, which both the Democratic and Republican Parties have favored. This pact is not a world-wide policy, but a limited arrangement with a neighbor. If it proves to be mutually profitable, it will be continued, as it ought to be, but if, on the contrary, it proves hurtful to any form of American industry, or destructive to our prosperity, the remedy is in our own hands. We can withdraw from the arrangement at any time, without even consulting the other party to the agreement. The contract is not effectual until it receives the assent of both parties, but either party can compel a new adjustment at any time, by rescinding its approving action.

The plight of the standpatters is both ludicrous, and pitiable. Every argument which they direct against the agreement, is a covert attack on the President. If it is supposed to menace our prosperity, the President is convicted of leading the attack. If it is free trade, then the President is a free trader. If it is an attack upon the principle of protection, then the President is the man behind the gun. If the people are being misled, then the Republican President is misleading them. If the people are following a false light, it is a light in the hand of the Republican leader. If the Republican Party is being wrecked, as the standpatters allege, the President is on the job, as the wrecker. So much for the predicament of the standpatters, who, like the demoniacs of the Scriptures, are ready to rend themselves with rage, at the plight in which they find themselves. But listen to the President, in defense of his recommendation.

This is not a violation of the protective principle, as that has been authoritatively announced by those who uphold it, because that principle does not call for a tariff between this country, and one whose conditions as to production, population and wages are so like ours, and when our common boundary line of 3,000 miles in itself, must make a radical distinction between our commercial treatment of Canada, and of any other country. The Dominion has greatly prospered. It has an active, aggressive and intelligent people. They are coming to the parting of the ways. They must decide soon, whether they are to regard themselves as permanently isolated from our markets, by a perpetual wall, or whether we are to be commercial friends. Both countries in their industrial development, have to meet the competition of lower-priced labor in other parts of the world. Both follow the policy of encouraging the development of home industries, by protective duties within reasonable limits.

But the President is not content to point out the advantages in general, of the agreement which he negotiated. He proceeds to point out the advantage to the farmers:—

The benefit to our widespread agricultural implement industry, from the reduction of Canadian duties in the agreement, is clear. My purpose in making a reciprocal trade agreement with Canada, has been, not only to obtain one, which would be mutually advantageous to both countries, but one which also would be truly national in its scope, as applied to our own country, and of benefit to all sections. The imports of Canada in 1910, were $376,000,000, of which amount the United States contributed more than $223,000,000. The reduction in the duties imposed by Canada, will largely increase this amount, and give us an even larger share of her market than we now enjoy. We have secured free entry into Canada for the cottonseed oil of the South, a most important product, with a rapidly expanding consumption in the Dominion. This agreement with Canada, will extend the market for numerous products of the United States, among the inhabitants of a prosperous neighboring country, with an increasing population, and an increasing purchasing power. I therefore, earnestly hope that this measure will be promptly enacted into law.

So much for the message of the President, which is proper to be reproduced in part in this connection. As the man on trial, at the hands of his one-time party friends, he ought to be heard in his own defense. But a Democrat can defend his own attitude toward this measure, without regard to the merry war between the President, and his party. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who stoutly opposes reciprocity, avers that he would like to see the President demonstrate his case. Well, in the opinion of some at least, the reasoning of the President, as contained in his message, may be fairly set against all the railing accusations that have been brought against his favorite measure, by his quondam followers.

What is reciprocity? Merely an agreement between two countries, to modify their imposts, so as to enlarge a mutually profitable trade. The Canadian duties operate against our products, when sold in Canada. Our tariff operates against Canadian products, when sold on this side of the line. We sell much more largely to Canada, than Canada sells to us. The balance is altogether in our favor. Hence, an enlargement of our trade will increase our balance. Does that spell danger to the United States? Our profit is in that balance. Increase that balance, and you increase our profit.

In the last five years we have bought from Canada goods to the extent of $393,913,673, while we have sold her goods amounting to $886,417,376. Difference in our favor is $492,503,703. Canada is a good customer. It is to our interest to make her a better one. In a nutshell, that is the purpose of this reciprocal agreement. The most frenzied opponent of reciprocity, is the Paper Trust. Most of the misleading statements and specious objections to the measure, can be traced to this source.

Reciprocity would give this country cheaper paper, a matter in which we are intensely interested, for there is hardly a family which does not take a newspaper. Owing to the great advance in the price of the paper on which their issues are printed, the newspapers found themselves in a dilemma from which there were only two exits, one was to secure cheaper paper over the head of the Paper Trust, the other was to submit to its exactions, and raise their subscription rates. It is not difficult to see that the interests of the great newspaper-reading public are on the side of cheaper paper. Not daring to come into the open, and confess the selfish reason for its opposition to reciprocity, the Paper Trust, which controls the prices for plain paper, writing paper, news paper, school books, et cetera, puts its opposition to the measure, on the pretended ground of its interest in the farmers. Let the farmers be of good cheer. They are not interested in preserving the monopoly of this great corporation. On the contrary, the real leaders of the Republican Party have been forced to recognize that the combinations and trusts have exacted unreasonable profits from the consumers. In the latter class, all farmers of every character, large and small, are included. To illustrate:

As far back as August 20, 1910, President Taft saw the handwriting on the wall, indicating the public dissatisfaction with the stand-pat attitude of his party. In his famous Beverly letter he admitted that this dissatisfaction was well founded, and that the interests had oppressed the consumers. He wrote as follows:

The excess of tariff was not regarded as objectionable, because it was supposed that competition between those who enjoyed the high protection would keep the price to the consumer down to what was reasonable, for the manufacturer. The evil of excessive tariff rates, however, showed itself, in the temptation to manufacturers to combine, and suppress competition, and then to maintain prices, so as to take advantage of the excess tariff rate.

Speaking to the farmers, at the National Corn Exposition, at Columbus, Ohio, on February 10, 1911, the President said:

I am a Republican, and the Republican Party has always advocated, and pursued the policy of protection to American products, and manufactures. For a long time that policy had little, or no limitation. It was thought that tariffs on protected products could not be too high, and that if all foreign products were excluded, competition would stimulate production, and reduce its cost, and its price. The temptation to destroy competition by combinations became so great, however, that the party in its platform modified its policy.

Again on February 11, 1911, speaking at Springfield before the General Assembly of Illinois, the President repeated his statement to the effect that an excessive tariff had bred monopolies and trusts, to the prejudice of the general public. The main thought of the Columbus speech is presented in slightly different phraseology as follows:

There was a time when leading Republicans thought there was no danger in having a tariff higher than necessary to protect an industry.

The Democrats have never entertained this economic heresy, so, having nothing to recant, they welcome the President as a convert to the truth which, in time, will make him free. Proceeding, the President declared that—it was thought—

By the Republicans only, I may say—that if the country was made dependent on manufactures, behind the tariff wall, the competition between the manufacturers would stimulate the reduction in the cost of production, and thus reduce the cost of the product.

Not at all. The Democrats have always insisted, that once given control of the situation, the trusts would not put their prices at the lowest figures consistent with a reasonable profit, but on the contrary would fix those prices at the very highest level that the trade would carry. This has been the result in the case of every product controlled by a trust. In buying, they fix the price without competition, at the lowest figure that will keep the producer going, for they are careful not to put him out of business, though in the case of the burley tobacco raisers, they almost accomplished this result. In selling, they are equally the masters of the situation, for there is no one to say them nay. At last the abuses which others have long since perceived, have opened the eyes of the President, for at Springfield, as at Columbus, he concluded by saying:

The temptation to combine, by which the prices could be controlled, and thus the excessive tariff taken advantage of, has led to a modification of the protection theory.

I have been careful to reproduce these statements of the President, for they indicate an interesting evolution of attitude, in the case of one Republican, at least. As a Democrat, I am tempted to say to him and to all like him, who at last have seen the light: "I told you so." In the theory of the standpatter, the rule of the trusts is a benevolent despotism. The fundamental theory of Democracy is opposed to despotisms, benevolent or otherwise. No combination of capital, large enough to control the market, may be trusted to handle such a situation with an eye single to the public interests.

Such an anticipation is inconsistent with our knowledge of, and experience with, the selfishness of human nature. Hence the Democrats have always insisted, that the interests of the consumer must be secured, either through the control of the trusts by the Government, or by the application of domestic, or foreign competition to the situation. No Democrat, no matter what his political adversaries may say, would knowingly support any policy that would bank the fires of a single furnace, or interrupt the musical whir of the spindles, in a single factory. If a great trust, like the Paper Trust, insists that it is entitled to control the market, and fix the prices of its product to secure a reasonable profit, the consumers who pay those prices, are entitled to a look in upon its books, in order that it may ascertain what the trust calls a reasonable profit. Failing to secure this inspection, it may well conclude that the profit is unreasonable, and go elsewhere for a cheaper product. This is what reciprocity proposes to do, to give us cheaper paper, and cheaper agricultural implements, and cheaper many other things, at the same time increasing the profits of our commerce with Canada, by enlarging the markets for our products in that country. The suggestion that Canadian wheat, or hay, or sheep, or horses, will flood this country, and depress the home market is absurd. We sell Canada more cattle than she sells us. We sell Canada six times as many horses, as she sells us. We sell her 17 times as much meat, and dairy products, as she sells us. We sell her almost five times as much breadstuffs, as she sells us. The danger from Canadian sheep is even more remote. Canada specializes on them, and raises only a comparatively small quantity of high-grade stock. The price of sheep in the United States runs from $2.90 a head, to $5.30, while in Canada the price runs from $4 to $7. We need the sheep of that country to cross with our sheep, and produce a better grade of domestic animals. The Government statistics to support the assertions which I have made, are as follows, for the last five years:

Horses:
Sold to Canada	$14,172,075
Bought from Canada	2,549,201
Cattle:
Sold to Canada	1,578,179
Bought from Canada	1,193,796
Meat and dairy:
Sold to Canada	17,011,017
Bought from Canada	904,191
Breadstuffs:
Sold to Canada	31,596,556
Bought from Canada	6,678,884

Now if these are the figures of our trade with the present restrictions on our intercourse, it is perfectly plain that with the impediments removed, this trade will be enormously increased in the existing ratio, which is altogether in our favor. This trade is either desirable, or undesirable, either to our advantage, or to our disadvantage. If it is the latter, then shut it out by erecting the tariff wall favored by the gentleman from Michigan, which has no top, save the blue vault of heaven. But if it is the former, should a Democrat be criticized for favoring a policy which will enlarge our commercial intercourse with a friendly country, a policy which has received the distinct approbation of both the Democratic, and Republican Parties. In the Democratic platform of 1892, it is declared that:

Trade interchange on the basis of reciprocal advantage to the countries participating, is a time-honored doctrine of the Democratic faith.

In the Republican platform of 1892, we find our friends pointing with pride to—the success of the Republican policy of reciprocity, under which our export trade has increased, and new and enlarged markets opened for the products of our farmers, and workshops.

We are not without the lamp of experience in this matter. Reciprocity has been tried out, under a former treaty with Canada, under conditions that in all respects parallel those of the present time. In addition the treaty of 1854 was, if anything, more far-reaching in its provisions, than the agreement negotiated by the President. Under the beneficial operation of that treaty there was an enormous increase of profitable traffic between this country and Canada. But for the intervention of the Civil War, and the temporary friction which it caused between this country and Great Britain, the treaty of 1854 would not have been repealed. As it was, its repeal was justly regarded as a public calamity. The continuous pressure of public opinion favorable to its restoration, is the impelling cause of the present agreement. After the fashion of the cuttle fish, the standpatters have ejected so much obscuring matter into the waters of this controversy, that at times we lose sight of the main proposition, which is to build up, not destroy, our prosperity by the simple and familiar process, of expanding our commerce, and enlarging our markets, through a reciprocal commercial agreement. Commerce and prosperity have gone hand in hand from the time of King Solomon, who sent his fleets and caravans to the uttermost parts of the known world, and by this wise policy raised his country to an unexampled pitch of glory, and riches.

But we should not limit our contemplation to the consideration of the pending measure, though technically it is the only one before us. The companion bill to this measure, admits free of duty, agricultural implements, sewing machines, fence wire, and many other products of daily consumption on the farm. This bill will afford the standpatters an opportunity to illustrate the sincerity of their attitude, in seeking to amend the present bill. If they favor the principle of their amendments, they will soon be afforded an opportunity to square their professions, by their acts. On many articles of essential interest to the farmers, the present tariff is prohibitive, or so nearly so, that the revenue raised is negligible. This situation has resulted in the formation of those rapacious trusts, whose sinister operations finally opened the eyes of President Taft to the mischief of their existence in the body politic. Prominent among these combinations is the trust in agricultural implements, which dominates the whole domestic market. For a number of years this combination has sold many of its products in foreign countries, at a lower price than at home, and impudently justified this practice, to the agricultural associations that protested against its obvious unfairness. Agricultural implements of every kind are placed on the free list in the companion bill—in order to remove, or prevent, any possible discrimination against our farmers in the prices of these necessary articles, and to place them on an equal footing with their competitors elsewhere in the world. Our domestic manufactures of agricultural implements, tools, and vehicles, have grown to great proportions, and are largely organized into great trusts, and combinations. These organizations are selling their products all over the world, meeting and overcoming all opposition. They need no protection. Our imports of agricultural implements are insignificant. The value of all such imports, free and dutiable, amounted to $122,302 in 1910. The export of these implements has become a matter of more importance, than the domestic trade, the figures indicating an increase from $3,859,184, in 1890, to $28,124,033, in 1910.

Another item of great value to the cotton farmers of the South, is bagging, and bailing materials controlled by the "Bagging Trust." These materials are placed on the free list. The Payne-Aldrich bill, put hides on the free list, for the benefit of the leather industries, particularly the tanners. Leather boots, shoes, harness and saddlery are put on the free list in the companion bill, for the benefit of the farmers, and the consumers generally. The sewing machine is a machine of universal necessity. The American consumer is entitled to a price on these machines, as favorable as that given to foreigners. Sewing machines can be made here as cheaply, as in any quarter of the globe, but for years it has been a notorious fact, that the concerns making these machines in the United States, have sold them at lower prices to foreigners, than to the domestic consumer. These machines have been properly placed on the free list. The passage of this bill, as a companion measure to the reciprocity pact, will mark a long step forward in the battle of the people, with the special interests. The long lane of Republican triumphs, had a sudden turn in the election of last fall. That election was an upheaval, a cataclysm, that shook from place and power many men who constituted a reactionary element in public life, men who had heard, but had not heeded, the voice of the people during the sessions of the Sixty-first Congress. It has brought into this Chamber many new faces, and much young and aggressive blood, consecrated to the uplift of the men and women who by the way of bitter travail, produce the wealth of this country. The Democratic Party in the present House, has already made good, and by its initial acts, justified the hopes of its supporters, and brought confusion to its adversaries. The time is at hand when the obscuring mists will roll away from the political skies, and the party of Jefferson, and of Jackson will come into its own again, as a controlling force in national affairs. That time will be the dawning of the morning, of a more glorious day of greater opportunity, and more abounding prosperity.

Mr. HARRISON of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask now that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] will consume some of his time.

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOWLAND]. [Applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who speak on this subject may have the right to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman that that is a motion that can not be put in committee. The House only can give such leave. In committee leave to extend may be given only to separate gentlemen.

Mr. DALZELL. The Chair is right, and I was in error about that.

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that that right be granted for myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PICKETT] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. But, Mr. Chairman, wherein is that competent in Committee of the Whole, and not competent to apply to more than one?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that there are a number of precedents, running over a series of years, that a Committee of the Whole can grant leave only upon the individual request of Members, whereas the House can grant general leave.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to be allowed the privilege of revising my remarks and extending them in spots where necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOWLAND. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that this time will not be taken out of my allotment. It is suggested to me that it is now an opportune time to ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HOWLAND. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request—that I may be allowed to extend the remarks I have made in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] makes the same request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. HOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the fervid rhetoric to which we have listened to-day, I propose to give my cordial support to the pending bill. [Applause.]

I do not know whether my action in this respect will meet with the approval of my constituents or not, but I am absolutely satisfied that that action is eternally and everlastingly right, and on that ground I take my stand. [Applause.]

Every discussion that has come up which touches on the question of reciprocal agreements has always aroused on this floor the bitterest antagonism. This antagonism was encountered at the time of the adoption of the Hawaiian treaty. The same fight was had over the Cuban differential. Members became hysterical, and charged that ruin stared our industries in the face. But those storms came and passed away, and we proceeded serenely on our career of prosperity.

Every piece of progressive legislation, every departure from the beaten path always meets with bitter opposition.

It is indeed interesting, when these questions arise, to note the alignment and the position taken by Members upon the floor and their attitude upon these questions.

I was indeed interested yesterday as I listened to the labored and strained effort of the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] in the long apology which he presented to the House and to the country for his position on this bill. No measure presented to the Congress by the Administration has ever received anything at his hands but carping criticism. The reason is perfectly patent to those who are familiar with political conditions. No man inveighed more severely against the Payne-Aldrich bill and its iniquities than the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin. He pleaded for the common people—oh, how he loved the dear common people!—and told about the iniquitous prohibitive tariffs in the Payne-Aldrich bill. He told what he would do for the common people if he got a chance to vote for lower duties on the necessities of life. Now that chance is presented to him to do the very thing he was talking about then, and he takes an hour to tell the country why he does not propose to do it. No one has advocated more earnestly the conservation of our natural resources, yet when in the pending bill the natural resources of all Canada are offered us and we are to be permitted access to the mineral and forest wealth of half a continent, the gentleman from Wisconsin proposes to vote against it.

It is easy to stand up on the floor and name yourself a progressive Republican. I claim that privilege, reserving the right of writing my own definition; but when the Payne-Aldrich bill was before the House, with its maximum and minimum provisions, with its enlarged free list, with many lowered duties, with its corporation tax, and improved administrative features, he voted against that bill, and thereby voted to continue the higher duties of the Dingley bill in force; and now, when the opportunity is presented to the gentleman to vote for free food products and lower duties on many manufactured articles, he proposes to vote in favor of continuing those duties on foodstuffs in force as they are in the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill. Oh, progress! The gentleman from Wisconsin stands with his face toward the rising sun and marches steadily backward toward the camp of the reactionaries and standpatters; and as I listened to the sinuous, devious argument of the gentleman from Wisconsin I was reminded—I say it all in good nature—of that old couplet, which runs something like this:

> It wiggled in, it wiggled out,
> And left the people all in doubt,
> Whether the bird that made the track
> Was going north or coming back.

[Laughter.]

I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS], and I give my most cordial indorsement to the brilliant tribute which he paid to the yeomanry of our country. Yes, the home on the farm is an institution and not a factory; but, Mr. Chairman, there are millions of homes of wage earners and salaried men in this country that are just as much institutions as the home on the farm. And it makes no difference, sir, whether that home is included within the four narrow, bare walls of a tenement house in the great city, it incloses all that is dear to the hopes and aspirations of the human soul; and while I speak for the yeomanry of my country, in my legislative action I shall not limit it to the consideration of any particular class. If I believed that this legislation would sacrifice or damage the farmers of my country I would not give it my support. Neither would I give it my support if I believed it would injure any class of citizens in this country. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, it is very true that the home on the farm is an institution, and when hard times come the farmer can not sell his produce; but the gaunt wolf of hunger never looks in at his window. But when dividends stop and the factory shuts down and the pay envelope does not come around, the wage earner must starve or steal.

Oh, some gentlemen are unduly exercised upon this subject of the agricultural interests. Why, from Nova Scotia, from New Brunswick to British Columbia, there is one long wail going up from the Canadian agriculturists, protesting against the enactment of this law by the Canadian Parliament, on the ground that it will destroy the agricultural interests of Canada. The distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS] called attention to the fact that the legislative assembly of New Brunswick had passed a resolution against the adoption by the Canadian Parliament of this reciprocity agreement. And a peculiar manifestation developed here yesterday. A long telegraphic communication was received here on the floor and put in the RECORD by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]. It was a copy of a statute that had just been passed by the legislative assembly of New Brunswick. It strikes me we are in pretty close connection with the provincial legislative assembly of New Brunswick to get telegraphic communications here immediately of adverse legislation of foreign Governments.

Is the parliament of the Canadian Province of New Brunswick, which is bitterly opposed to the ratification of the pending bill in the Dominion Parliament at Ottawa, attempting to play big politics with the Congress of the United States by passing a law the effect of which would be to irritate the American people and have a tendency to defeat this legislation? I ask the question.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWLAND. I have declined to yield, but under the circumstances I think I ought to.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I want to assure the gentleman from Ohio that I am not a secret agent of New Brunswick.

Mr. HOWLAND. I will relieve the gentleman from the necessity of defending himself against that imputation. I did not intend to cast any imputation upon anyone. The gentleman was merely the agency through which the telegram was put in the RECORD. The fact that the parliament of New Brunswick is adverse to this legislation suggested the thought that they might think it would help to defeat the reciprocity bill in the Congress of the United States if they passed a law to which we would naturally take exception.

Mr. Chairman, it might be interesting, after all the eulogies which have been paid and all the tears that have been shed in behalf of the agricultural interests in this country by gentlemen representing agricultural constituencies—and I represent one myself—to take up just briefly and read a few extracts from the debate in the House of Commons at Ottawa on this subject:

DEBATES IN HOUSE OF COMMONS.

[Mr. W. W. German (Welland), March 2, 1911, column 4582.]

It is said that the farmers will be benefited. So far as the county of Welland is concerned, there are two townships in the county which grow quantities of fruit, but they also grow large quantities of ordinary farm products, and it may be said that the people of the county are almost exclusively a farming community. In 1891 the farmers of that county were anxious to get into the Buffalo market, but in view of the home market we have established since then, they are not now so anxious. I doubt very much, sir, if the farmers of my county or any other county in Canada will be very considerably benefited, if benefited at all, by this agreement. Why, sir, the whole argument of the statesmen of the United States in favor of this proposition is that it will decrease the cost of living in the United States; and how, in the name of all that is sensible, is it going to decrease the cost of living in the United States and at the same time give a higher price to our farmers for their farm products? I certainly can not reconcile these two things. But I do not think it will give any considerable benefit to the farmers of this country, and even if it did give them some small benefit, I think that benefit may be obtained at a cost too high for the general welfare of this country. Now, sir, let me say that in my own county there is at least one-third of it (comprising the townships bordering on the Niagara River) contiguous to the Buffalo market. The Buffalo market would be a natural market for the agriculturists there, and they might in some instances get a higher price for their commodities on the Buffalo market, and it might be more convenient for them than to go to the town of Welland, where they would get nearly the same price.

But, sir, what would happen—the same vehicles that carry the Canadian farm products to the Buffalo market for sale will bring back from Buffalo the merchandise required by the farmers to carry on their farming operations, and which will be purchased from the United States merchants. It has already been said what the effect will be, and I believe it, that British Columbia will trade with the Pacific Coast States, that the western Provinces will trade with the States to the south of them, and so on from the Pacific to the Atlantic, our people will be trading with the American people north and south, instead of trading east and west, among themselves.

[Mr. Broder, Apr. 5, 1911. Column 6877.]

What effect is this treaty to have on the interests of the farmer? After all, it is the cold question of business. There are localities in the country which it will no doubt help. It will help the country in spots. How is the farmer in Ontario to be affected? It will affect four large industries adversely—the hog market, the horse market, the egg market, and the apple market. These are four principal products of Ontario and Quebec. There are others, but these I will deal with. Why do I say that it will affect the hog market? There are in the United States 49,000,000 hogs, and there are something less than 3,000,000 in Canada. That is 16 to 1, and it is worse than Bryan's. I intend to make a comparison of the average price for five years in Montreal and Chicago. Some people take Buffalo, but it is not a center, compared with Chicago, which is the principal center for hogs. Here are the yearly average prices of the hogs for five years in Montreal and Chicago:

Years.	Chicago.	Montreal.
1906	$6.20	$7.77
1907	6.10	7.43
1908	5.70	7.10
1909	7.35	8.64
1910	8.90	9.60
Average for the five years	6.85	8.10

What about horses? There are 21,000,000 horses in the United States. There are 12 States lying along either side of the Mississippi River which are adjacent to our western country, and in those 12 States, one-quarter of the whole United States in number, you find 11,600,000 horses. Does any one pretend to say that our western market, which is our best market for heavy horses, will not be supplied from those States? In the first place their horses are more easily got into the market, and with less risk to the buyer. What is the average price given to the American farmer—$108.19 on the farm, old and young and all. Again, the American authority gives the average of the Canadian horses on the farm at $133, almost $25 difference in favor of the Canadian.

I will now quote from the remarks of the Hon. George E. Foster in the Canadian House of Commons on February 9, 1911, and I commend the attention of the House to this line of argument:

In the United States what was the condition of things? A high tariff from time immemorial, growing higher through the Dingley bill and the McKinley bill and at last coming to a height of 45 per cent on an average on dutiable goods; against that a revolt broke out, a campaign was waged, and the slogan of the campaign in the Republican Party was a downward revision of the tariff in the United States. The Republican Party promised it; they were elected; they brought down their measure and the Payne-Aldrich bill ended not in any downward revision that was worth mentioning. What happened? They were defeated in the country. The insurgent force that swept the Republican Party out of power was pledged to downward revision. It was known by all men that the coming Congress would deal with that matter and it was known that they would deal with it in the line of taking off and diminishing duties especially on foodstuffs and natural resources. Canada would have secured these markets anyway, without reciprocity and without giving up her own.

It sounds to me, in view of the well-known attitude of the Democratic majority here, as though there might be some force in an argument of that kind addressed to the Canadian Parliament. I quote now from the remarks of Hon. Mr. Borden, of Halifax, leader of the opposition, on February 9, 1911, where he presents an argument about the money expended by Canada in building her railway transportation system from East to West, running into something like $700,000,000, and he continues:

We know how immensely important forests are to this country. Important not only in respect to their values as timber, but in their relation to the great waterway systems of this country. Important to the people of this country in every sense, and when we observe that the President of the United States over and over again directs the attention of Congress to the importance of giving to the people of the United States access to the forests of Canada, in order that their own may be preserved, surely that suggestion in that argument affords ample room for thought to the people of this country as to whether or not they should accept these proposals.

Hon E. D. Monk, on February 9, 1911, said in opposing ratification of treaty because "it tends to invade our forest wealth and other natural resources:

"We have constituted a commission of conservation. We have spent a great amount of time in the study of those resources and the means of conserving them, and we have just had a meeting at which it has been made apparent that we must change our course and in the future bring to the conservation of those great natural resources all that care which has been found wanting in other countries and which is necessary to prevent the waste of what constitutes the real strength of a nation."

Second argument—

"The tendency of the reciprocal agreement is admittedly to make our trade north and south, after they have been working 20 years to get lines of transportation east and west."

Mr. Foster, on February 14, 1911, further said:

What else have you done? You have reduced the meat duties. You have reduced the preserved and cured meat duties. In the northwest Provinces millions of dollars worth of these cured products have been going and a large trade has been carried on during the last seven years. Under this arrangement, if it comes into force, the northwest Provinces will be supplied absolutely from the packing establishments of Chicago, Milwaukee, and the near-by places in the United States. You take away from the packing industry of this country a part, and a valuable part, of its local market, the domestic market in the northwest, and you transfer it to the United States market.

Mr. Martin Burrell, on February 14, 1911, 3656 et seq., protests bitterly against the agreement as ruinous to fruit growers and market gardeners.

Mr. J. E. Armstrong, on February 16, 1911, said:

My good friend from Prince Edward Island spoke of the wonderful advantages the people of Canada would have in farm and dairy products by this arrangement. Does he know that we imported into Canada from the United States last year $52,597 worth of poultry and exported only $3,526 to the United States; imports of potatoes $213,554, exports to United States $36,770; imported $177,577 worth of eggs and exported to the United States $12,596; that 6,604 horses came in from the United States and we sent them 2,615?

He continues the argument and takes a strong stand against the treaty as injurious to farming interests on the ground that the United States is a great exporter to Canada.

Mr. Lemieux, on February 21, 1911, said:

We are told by my honorable friend (Mr. Sproul) that it is a one-sided agreement, but we also have one of the highest protectionists on this continent, Mr. JOE CANNON—Uncle Joe—prominent in American public life, who objects to this agreement because it is one-sided. It is, indeed, strange to find protectionists on both sides of the line agreeing that it is a one-sided agreement to the prejudice of each.

[Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, judging from the anxiety of our Canadian friends, I think our friends, the agricultural interests on this side of the line, as I said before, are unduly alarmed. The distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PICKETT] referred at some length to the old treaty which was in force, and I have been surprised in the course of this discussion, when it is claimed that this legislation will ruin the prosperity of our farmers, that we have not been referred to the ruin and privation that fell upon them during the 11 or 12 years that the treaty was in force. But no; no such figures have been presented, and no such figures can be presented, for everyone who has investigated that situation knows that during the time that that treaty was in force agriculture flourished as it never had flourished before in this country, and I say, without fear of successful contradiction, that if it had not been for the sympathy which the Canadian people manifested for the Southern Confederacy during the Civil War that treaty never would have been abrogated. No one would ever have conceived the idea of abrogating that treaty.

Oh, you can cite extracts in the discussion by partisan men in the Congress, made up entirely of Republicans just returned from the bitter conflicts, ready to take action in any direction where some hostile influence existed; but I want to cite as authority for the position which I have taken Mr. Stanwood, in his Tariff Controversies of a Hundred Years (vol. 2, p. 138). Mr. Stanwood is an impartial witness, though biased strongly in the interest of a protective tariff, and this is the language he uses in speaking of this very subject:

All through the North a feeling of resentment had been growing steadily on account of the apparently strong sympathy of the Canadians for the Confederate cause, and in the end it seemed to become the chief reason for abrogating the treaty.

It seems to be fashionable, Mr. Chairman, to call attention to the names of distinguished men and the positions which they have occupied upon this question. There has been a studied effort during this discussion to try to carry the impression that those of us who are favoring this legislation are departing from the time-honored principles of our party. There has been a studied effort to make it appear that the President of the United States in negotiating this treaty and recommending is passage by the Congress has violated the principles of his party.

At the time this old treaty was abrogated James A. Garfield was a Representative in Congress from the State of Ohio, and, as a Representative from the old nineteenth district of that State, a district loyal to the core, where secession sentiment was barely tolerated and where the agricultural interest at that time was by far the most important, was big enough and broad enough to vote against the abrogation of that treaty. He did not think that its operation for 12 years had been adverse to the interests of his agricultural constituents, and it was not. They cordially returned him to Congress term after term, then sent him to the Senate, and finally he was elected President of the United States.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make this suggestion to the gentleman, and that is that President Grant in his administration negotiated a treaty, or his Secretary of State negotiated a treaty, on the general lines of the Elgin treaty and on the lines of this treaty negotiated by President Taft.

Mr. HOWLAND. I am glad to have that; I did not have it in my list, and I am very glad to have the information.

Mr. DALZELL. It did not go very far.

Mr. HOWLAND. No; it was stopped just the same as all legislation that affects or seems to affect any protected interest is stopped. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McCALL. The Senate stopped it.

Mr. HOWLAND. Yes; the Senate stopped it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa a short time ago attempted to appeal to the loyalty which every Republican has for the name of James G. Blaine. It is true that Mr. Blaine voted in favor of the abrogation of the treaty in 1865, but I propose to call the attention of this House to Mr. Blaine's attitude in 1890 on the question of reciprocity. Did anybody ever hear that reciprocity was good Republican doctrine? You would think, to hear the discussions in this Chamber, that reciprocity was heresy. Why, we used to hear gentlemen talk glibly about reciprocity as the handmaiden of protection; but what has happened to that handmaiden of protection at the hands of the standpatters in this debate is simply awful.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. This is another girl; this is a different girl.

Mr. HOWLAND. It seems to be difficult for the standpatters to locate any girl by the name of Reciprocity. At the time the McKinley bill was under consideration in the Senate James G. Blaine was Secretary of State. He sent to Senator Hale an amendment which he had drafted. Before I take up that amendment I want to make this preliminary statement. I am aware of the position taken by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] on this question. He claims that the Republican doctrine of reciprocity is a mutual trade convention or agreement between this country and a foreign country in noncompeting products only.

Where does the distinguished gentleman get his authority for such a definition? I propose to show that it is not a correct statement of the Republican doctrine of reciprocity as understood and advocated by the most illustrious of our leaders and about which we have harangued and argued and talked so glibly. This amendment which Mr. Blaine sent to Senator Hale in 1890, when the McKinley bill was in the Senate, is as follows:

And the President of the United States is hereby authorized, without further legislation, to declare the ports of the United States free and open to all products of any nation of the American hemisphere upon which no export duties are imposed whenever and so long as such nation shall admit to its ports, free of all national, provincial (State), municipal, and other taxes, flour, corn meal, and other breadstuffs; preserved meats, fish, vegetables, and fruits; cottonseed oil, rice, and other provisions, including all articles of food; lumber, furniture, and all other articles of wood; agricultural implements and machinery, mining and mechanical machinery; and structural iron, steel rails, locomotives, railway cars and supplies, street cars, refined petroleum, or such other products of the United States as may be agreed upon.

There is the amendment offered by Mr. Blaine. Is there any distinction in that amendment between competitive and noncompetitive articles? [Applause.] None whatever. The Republican doctrine of reciprocity that has been advocated by our leaders is that we will concede limited access to our markets on more favorable terms to a given nation provided that nation gives us a substantial equivalent in her markets.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will my colleague yield for a brief suggestion?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOWLAND] has expired.

Mr. McCALL. I will yield 5 or 10 minutes more to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL] yield further time?

Mr. McCALL. I yield 10 minutes further.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOWLAND] yield to his colleague [Mr. LONGWORTH]?

Mr. HOWLAND. I do.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I simply want to ask my colleague if, in his judgment, it would be possible to have any reciprocity whatever with Canada except in competing articles?

Mr. HOWLAND. In reply to that I would say that even the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] admits that on the doctrine of noncompeting products reciprocity with Canada is impossible. The doctrine of reciprocity in noncompeting articles is simply a weapon used to kill off commercial trade agreements when they are brought forward and contain substantial mutual concessions. [Applause.] Why, what is a noncompeting product? Every pound of foodstuff that is imported into the United States, whether it can be produced here or not, competes with every domestic foodstuff that we have.

Would anybody say that tropical fruits imported into this country do not compete with domestic fruits? Take the manufacturing proposition. We can manufacture everything under the sun that we want that has a dollar in it to pay us a profit on the investment. And you can go down the line, and when you go down the line where are you? We are down to tea and coffee. Tea and coffee are necessities of life, and it was proposed in the Payne bill—but it did not get very far when the country found out what the proposition was—to put a tariff on tea and coffee, so that we could have a club with which to knock coffee and tea exporting countries in the head if they discriminated against us in their customs duties. That is to say, tea and coffee being noncompetitive, the tariff would, of course, under all constructions, be added to the retail price, and the consumer would pay it. In other words, it was proposed to tax our own people for the sake of punishing a foreign commercial nation. To punish ourselves in order to make a commercial rival be good. What would Brazil care how much of an import tax we put on coffee? She did not have to pay it; we paid it. Why, that reminds me of the man who committed suicide in order to make his enemy regret it.

I was diverted just a moment from a consideration of the position of ex-Secretary Blaine upon this question. In his letter to Senator FRYE, referring to his amendment to the McKinley bill—I know everyone is familiar with this celebrated letter, and I want to have it in the RECORD, at least a few sentences from it—he said:

> It furnishes an opportunity where the farmer may be benefited primarily, undeniably richly benefited. Here is an opportunity for a Republican Congress to open the markets of 40,000,000 people to the products of the American farm.

And in discussing the McKinley bill, then under consideration in the Senate, he said, in the same letter:

> There is not a section or line in the entire bill that will open a market for another bushel of wheat or another barrel of pork.

This amendment which Secretary Blaine advocated was the method by which he proposed to benefit the farmer and enlarge his market for agricultural products. Oh, but you say, this was not adopted. Before I pass to the consideration of that question I want to say to the House that Secretary Blaine was so anxious to have this amendment adopted that he sent Mr. William E. Curtis, who was secretary, I believe, of the Pan American Congress in session here at that time, to Maj. McKinley and asked him if he would not introduce the amendment and try to get it adopted in the House. Mr. Curtis, in the National Reciprocity Magazine of August 15, 1902, says that the amendment met the approval of Maj. McKinley, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee; that he submitted it to the consideration of that committee and advocated and voted for it in the committee. [Applause.] Maj. McKinley's vote was the only vote in favor of it in the committee. After it had been defeated in the committee, Mr. Curtis says "That Maj. McKinley, Mr. Blaine, Mr. Windom, who was then Secretary of the Treasury, and other members of the administration worked hard to bring the committee to their senses. There was a meeting one night at the Ebbitt House, at which Mr. Blaine spoke with greater force and earnestness than he had ever heard him before or since. He finally got an amendment attached to the bill. It was not what he wanted. His negotiations were very much restricted. He had asked for bread, and they gave him a stone."

Mr. Chairman, the amendment which was finally adopted in the Senate was offered by Senator Aldrich, of Rhode Island, and authorized the President to place a duty on sugar and molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, raw and uncured, when any nation discriminated against us, these articles being placed on the free list in the bill.

But even in the Aldrich amendment, which is called a reciprocal amendment, the distinction between competitive and noncompetitive products is entirely lost sight of, for no one would contend for a moment that sugar and molasses and hides, raw and uncured, were not competitive products.

Mr. Chairman, I could go on down and take up the Dingley bill, sections 3 and 4, even down to the Payne tariff bill, if you please, which contains some reciprocal provisions; but nowhere in these laws do you find the distinction between competitive and noncompetitive products. The nearest intimation that you have of it is in section 4 of the Dingley bill, where it is provided that certain items may be transferred to the free list for a limited time by the President, provided "the products are the natural products of the foreign country and not of the United States." But even there the distinction is not drawn between competitive and noncompetitive products.

And so I take it that you will look long and far before you will find anything that will authorize you to lay down the distinction as accepted political Republican doctrine that reciprocal trade agreements must be in noncompeting products only. [Applause.]

Mr. McKinley was elected President in 1896, and immediately proceeded to carry out his campaign promises to the American people, and insisted upon legislation which would open up the mills of the country rather than the mints.

The Dingley bill was passed, and an era of prosperity came upon the country unparalleled in its history; and we soon came to the question of whether or not our agricultural interests, which were prospering, and our manufacturing interests, which were prospering, would not produce a surplus and a glut in the market, with its consequent business depression and hard times. President McKinley, to whom it was given to look further into the future than falls to the lot of most men, grasped that proposition thoroughly, and immediately commenced to cast about for ways and means to obtain larger foreign markets, in order that our industries might continue prosperous and the surplus of our agriculturists and manufacturers might find a profitable market.

Under the authority contained in section 4 of the Dingley bill he authorized and instructed Mr. Kasson to negotiate certain commercial trade agreements with foreign countries. You can examine those treaties—the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] can examine those treaties—as carefully as he likes, and if he can find the distinction there between competitive and noncompetitive products as the line of discrimination along which President McKinley negotiated those treaties, I would be obliged to him if he would point it out, because I have not been able to find it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes more, if possible.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, I will yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HOWLAND. I thank the gentleman for his courtesy, as I am very anxious to call specific attention to a few of the provisions of the Kasson treaties. In consideration of substantial equivalents in her markets the convention for Barbados admitted into the United States cane sugar and molasses, fresh fruit, fresh vegetables, and asphalt at a reduction of 12½ per cent. In consideration for substantial equivalents in her markets the convention for Turks and Caicos Islands gave salt the benefit of a 12½ per cent reduction on the Dingley rates. For Jamacia cane sugar and molasses were given a reduction of 12½ per cent from the Dingley rates. Citrus fruits, pineapples, fresh vegetables, including potatoes and onions, and rum were given a reduction of 20 per cent of the Dingley rates. The convention for Bermuda gave potatoes, onions, tomatoes, and other fresh vegetables, bulbs, and natural flowers a reduction of 20 per cent of the Dingley rates. The convention with the Argentine Republic gave a reduction of 20 per cent on hides, wool, and sugar for substantial equivalents in our markets. Many other instances might be cited, but I have called attention to a sufficient number to demonstrate conclusively the correctness of my position.

The Kasson treaties were not ratified by the Senate, and the only reason why I call attention to them is to establish the fact that they did not discriminate between competitive and noncompetitive products. President McKinley indorsed and approved those treaties, and we thus see clearly that he did not recognize the doctrine of noncompeting products as the correct basis on which to negotiate reciprocal trade agreements.

Mr. Chairman, President McKinley was not discouraged by the failure of the Senate to ratify the Kasson treaties. In his second inaugural he called attention to the necessity for larger markets in the following language:

> Our diversified productions, however, are increasing in such unprecedented volume as to admonish us of the necessity of still further enlarging our foreign markets by broader commercial relations. For this purpose reciprocal trade arrangements should in liberal spirit be carefully cultivated and promoted.

In the tragic speech at Buffalo, which I will once more call to the attention of the House—"lest we forget"—he said that reciprocal trade agreements must be enacted; that we must yield something to our competitors, something of our markets, of our tariff rates, in order to get concessions from them, agreements founded upon a valid consideration. And so I say here this afternoon that when the name of McKinley is used as opposing treaties of this character it is erroneously used, and the language at Buffalo, prophetic as it would seem to me, carries an absolute refutation of such statements. In speaking on this subject at Buffalo on the day of his assassination President McKinley said:

> We have a vast and intricate business, built up through years of toil and struggle, in which every part of the country has its stake, which will not permit of either neglect or of undue selfishness. NO NARROW, SORDID POLICY WILL SUBSERVE IT. The greatest skill and wisdom on the part of the manufacturers and producers will be required to hold and increase it. Our industrial enterprises, which have grown to such great proportions, affect the homes and occupations of the people and the welfare of the country. Our capacity to produce has developed so enormously and our products have so multiplied that the problem of more markets requires our urgent and immediate attention.

Only a broad and enlightened policy will keep what we have. No other policy will get more. In these times of marvelous business energy and gain we ought to be looking to the future, strengthening the weak places in our industrial and commercial systems, so that we may be ready for any storm or strain.

By sensible trade arrangements which will not interrupt our home production we shall extend the outlets for our increasing surplus. A system which provides a mutual exchange of commodities is manifestly essential to the continued healthful growth of our export trade. We must not repose in fancied security that we can forever sell everything and buy little or nothing. If such a thing were possible it would not be best for us or those with whom we deal. We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor.

Reciprocity is the natural outgrowth of our wonderful industrial development under the domestic policy now firmly established. What we produce beyond our domestic consumption must have a vent abroad. The excess must be relieved through a foreign outlet and we should sell everything we can and buy wherever the buying will enlarge our sales and productions, and thereby make a greater demand for home labor.

THE PERIOD OF EXCLUSIVENESS IS PAST. The expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem. Commercial wars are unprofitable. A policy of good will and friendly trade relations will prevent reprisals. Reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not. IF PERCHANCE SOME OF OUR TARIFFS ARE NO LONGER NEEDED FOR REVENUE OR TO ENCOURAGE AND PROTECT OUR INDUSTRIES AT HOME, WHY SHOULD THEY NOT BE EMPLOYED TO EXTEND AND PROMOTE OUR MARKETS ABROAD?

And now, Mr. Chairman, I would call attention to the message to Congress, December 3, 1901, of President Roosevelt upon this subject squarely in line with McKinley, but my time is almost exhausted; therefore in conclusion I say to this committee that President Taft, in negotiating and sending to the Congress the pending treaty, is acting in accordance with the best Republican doctrine [applause]; he is acting in accordance with the doctrines of Grant, of Garfield, of Blaine, of William McKinley, and of Theodore Roosevelt; and if anybody can question the Republicanism of those men, I should like to hear him do it. Certainly it can not be done in this presence. [Applause.]

I give my support to the pending measure, in the full faith that it makes for national progress, and will promote the common welfare of our people. "No narrow, sordid policy will subserve it. The period of exclusiveness is past." [Applause.]

Mr. MCCALL. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I believe thoroughly in the principle and practice of protection, and I have been asked how I can consistently with that belief support this bill. My answer is that against the people of Canada we need no protection. The principle does not apply. They are a people composite like us, of many different races, but with the resultant dominant type very much like ours. They have similar ideals of public and private life and much the same standards of living. They have the same environment, are planted in a land with the same resources and products, where nature has spread for them the same obstacles, and by conquering them they have developed the same self-reliance and enterprise. [Applause.]

They have the same diversities of religion and blood and traditions which complex and perplex us. For thousands of miles there is no natural or artificial boundary between the two countries, and a wanderer without inquiring would never know with which nation he was sojourning. Their people have overrun the invisible boundary line in swarms and made their homes with us, and our people have returned the flattering compliment and in great multitudes taken up homes with them. No cannon frowns from either side against the other, and by reason of a most auspicious convention the inland seas between us are unvexed by any of the ships of war which nowadays are claimed as the necessary instruments of peace.

It would be difficult to imagine two countries more alike. To be sure, they preserve a monarchy and aristocracy while we maintain "a church without a bishop and a State without a king," but this superficial difference only illustrates the truth of Pope's hackneyed couplet:

> For forms of government let fools contest;
> Whate'er is best administered is best, for in aspiration and enjoyment of personal and political liberty, in deep-rooted hostility to tyranny and persecution, and in legal guaranties against them, it would be hard to detect any difference in the two nations. And it is the spirit of the people and not administration or laws that keeps alive freedom. The laws may be of ideal excellence for preserving true democracy, but a reckless or torpid population will nullify them.

Their industries are stimulated by the same protective policy we have found so successful. Both nations are developing along exactly the same lines, and if there are differences in standards and modes of life, they indicate only different stages of development. Equal differences exist between different parts of our own country.

Against such a country with such a population I see no reason to invoke the principle of protection.

I think it would be to the advantage of both countries that mutual trade and intercourse should be unfettered, that business and personal relations should be intimate, and that together we should spread over the continent a uniform and identical civilization. Certainly as the larger, richer, more highly developed neighbor, we ought not to find it to our disadvantage. The difference in the cost of production on the two sides of the line is too wavering and inconsiderable to be calculated, and under full reciprocity would quickly disappear. And so I think it is desirable that all tariff walls should be broken down between two countries so akin in everything which goes to make up their industrial life, and then production and trade may develop along whatever lines the unerring laws of mutual advantage shall determine. [Applause.]

Neither nature nor laws nor habits of life have given them any permanent advantage over us in the contest. We start on fair terms, and we ought not to shrink from the test. I should like to see unrestricted reciprocal trade in everything, and I welcome this pact not so much for itself as for the promise it gives of closer union and broader pacts. The important argument to my mind is not so much whether by fine calculations of probable imports or exports you can figure out a profit to us as it is that this is an initial step toward a greater trade movement and intimacy between these two related neighbors which will stimulate and modulate and steady their mutual development. Momentary local losses, which are likely to accompany any change of policy, will soon be swallowed up and forgotten in the general gain. Like the quality of mercy, it will be "twice blessed—it blesseth him that gives and him that takes."

Dr. Johnson said at the sale of Thrale's brewery:

> We are not here to sell a parcel of boilers and vats, but the potentiality of growing rich beyond the dreams of avarice.

And so the value of this pact is not the mere exchange of a few specified articles, but it is the opening of a new era in the relationship of two kindred and sympathetic nations.

The question of annexation has occasionally been brought up for the purpose of embarrassing this bill. Doubtless many persons on both sides of the line regret that when the original United States was formed Canada, whose destiny nature had apparently joined with ours, was not included in the Union. But no sane man believes that there is any purpose here, direct or indirect, ever to annex Canada against her will. It may happen generations from now that the countries will have so grown together that our descendants will mutually agree peacefully to unite their fortunes in one government. But that at present is only the vision of the dreamer and not the plan of any statesman.

And it is safe to say that there will never be any hostile action by this people to annex our friendly neighbors. Any such demonstration is meant as a bugaboo or a sensation, not as a serious purpose.

The far-seeing President who had the courage to negotiate the pact against the remonstrance of many of his own party and against the advice of astute calculators of political results has won for himself lasting fame. Whether it now becomes a law or not, whatever the immediate result on his fortunes, he has linked his name with a great step forward in our international relations. His policy may not win approval now, but it will never be retraced. If he can not complete it he can not be robbed of the honor of beginning. I am reminded of one of the finest passages in one of Schillers best tragedies, Don Carlos, where the Marquis of Posa says to the Queen:

> Er lege
> Die erste hand an diesen rohen stein.
> Ob er vollende oder unterliege
> Ihm einerlei. Er lege hand an. Wenn
> Jahr-hunderte dahin geflohen, wird
> Die vorsicht einen fuerstensohn wie er
> Auf einem thron wie seiner wiederholen,
> Und ihren neuen liebling mit derselben
> Begeisterung entzuenden.

The translation of it into prose takes away all of its beauty and much of its force.

> Let him begin the work on this unshapen stone. Whether he succeed or fail all alike to him—let him begin the work. And when centuries have rolled away Providence shall again raise a prince like him upon a throne like his and inspire her new favorite with the same noble purpose.

And I believe the President when he made this pact acted in that spirit and did not stop to weigh on pigmy scales the immediate party or local or personal advantage. His horizon was broader. He was but beginning a great work. He acted for what he thought was the ultimate permanent gain of both party and country. He offered to Canada that full reciprocity which between such kindred, intelligent, similar neighbors is bound to come. And whether it succeed or fail now, I believe this policy is certain of ultimate triumph and certain to bring honor to the courageous President by whom it was inaugurated. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHERLEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 4412, the Canadian reciprocity bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

GENERAL LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who speak on this bill may have leave to print for five legislative days on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that all gentlemen who speak on this bill may have leave to print in the RECORD for five legislative days on the subject of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent reference of the bill (H. R. 4704) making appropriations and providing for continuing contracts for the construction, repair, and preservation of public works on the Missouri River between Kansas City and the mouth be changed from the Committee on Appropriations to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

ADJOURNMENT.

Then, on motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned until Wednesday, April 19, at 12 o'clock meridian.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of Waupaca River, Wis. (H. Doc. No. 20); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of Stilaguamish River, Wash. (H. Doc. No. 19); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of Great Kills Harbor, N. Y. (H. Doc. No. 18); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4704) making appropriations and providing for a continuing contract for the construction, repair, and preservation of public works on the Missouri River between Kansas City and the mouth, and the same was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, April 19, 1911.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., as follows:

Our Father in heaven, help us to appreciate Thy goodness and Thy wonderful works unto the children of men, that we may think nobly, feel deeply, and act worthily in the vocation whereunto Thou has called us, and thus hallow Thy name. In the spirit of the Lord, Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTING ERRORS IN ENROLLMENT OF APPROPRIATION ACTS.

Mr. FITZGERALD, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, reported House joint resolution 1, to correct errors of certain appropriation acts, approved March 4, 1911, which was read a first and second time and, together with the accompanying report (H. Rept. 5), referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall not make the point of order, but I desire to say that this is not in order as a privileged matter on this holy day—Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I understand that some of the matters I wish to report are not privileged, but I desire to call them to the attention of the House.

Mr. MANN. I understood that the gentleman from Alabama would like to make a motion to suspend with proceeding under that calendar.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order, the point of order will be sustained.

Mr. MANN. No; I do not make the point of order.

The SPEAKER. There is no business for what is called Calendar Wednesday, anyway.

EXPENSES OF FIRST SESSION SIXTY-SECOND CONGRESS.

Mr. FITZGERALD, by the direction of the Committee on Appropriations, also reported House joint resolution 2, making appropriations for the payment of certain expenses incident to the first session of the Sixty-second Congress, which was read a first and second time and, with the accompanying report (H. Rept. 6), referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

MILEAGE.

Mr. FITZGERALD, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, also reported House joint resolution 3, making immediately available the appropriations for mileage of Senators and Members of the House of Representatives, which was read a first and second time and, with the accompanying report (H. Rept. 7), referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

AMERICAN RED CROSS.

Mr. FITZGERALD, by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, also reported House joint resolution 38, to grant authority to the American Red Cross to erect temporary structures in Potomac Park, Washington, D. C., which was read a first and second time and, with the accompanying report (H. Rept. 8), referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to give notice that as the opportunity presents I shall endeavor to call these measures up for consideration.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, to-day is Calendar Wednesday, but I understand that there is no business on the calendar. Calendar Wednesday can be dispensed with under the rules by a two-thirds vote of the House. I therefore move to dispense for to-day with the business that comes under the rule providing for Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. It has been decided by my predecessor that under the conditions as they prevail here to-day there is no necessity for the motion where there is no business on the calendar.

Mr. MANN. Of course it would require the calling of the calendar.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It would necessitate the calling of the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, to dispense with proceedings under the rule for Calendar Wednesday.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the motion was agreed to.

PLACING CERTAIN ARTICLES ON THE FREE LIST.

Mr. UNDERWOOD, by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, reported the bill (H. R. 4413) to place on the free list agricultural implements, cotton bagging, cotton ties, leather, boots and shoes, fence wire, meat, cereals, flour, bread, timber, lumber, sewing machines, salt, and other articles, which was read a first and second time and, with the accompanying report (H. Rept. 4), referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

ELECTION OF MEMBER TO COMMITTEE ON THE PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] I offer the following resolution, to fill a minority place on a committee.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 111.

Resolved, That JAMES WICKERSHAM be, and he is hereby, elected as a Delegate member of the Committee on the Public Lands.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

PRINTING VIEWS OF MINORITY.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the report just made from the Committee on Ways and Means I ask unanimous consent that the minority may have leave to file their views.

The SPEAKER. Within how long a time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. DALZELL. Say, until the disposition of the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. We granted the gentleman the other day that time in reference to the bill then pending before the House because we immediately reported it. It has been almost a week since the Committee on Ways and Means agreed to this bill, and I would ask the gentleman whether, if he should have permission to make a report by Monday, would that not be time enough?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes; Monday will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] have until Monday to file the views of the minority in reference to the bill H. R. 4413, which has been reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may have until Monday to file the views of the minority (H. Rept. 4, pt. 2) on the bill H. R. 4413. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CANADIAN RECIPROCITY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4412, a bill to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 4412, the Canadian reciprocity bill, with Mr. SHERLEY in the chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. GUDGER].

[Mr. GUDGER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire what the balance of time is; how much has been consumed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL], and myself?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has used, including the time yielded to the gentleman from Massachusetts, 8 hours and 40 minutes. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has used 6 hours and 56 minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to consume enough time to equalize it.

The CHAIRMAN. The genleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield so much time as he may desire to use to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, not, in my judgment, since the War with Spain and all that followed it, of benefit and of burden, has there been considered by the House of Representatives so important a bill as the one now pending. Therefore, it is entitled, without passion and without prejudice, to the careful, candid consideration of this great body, 391 in number, representing 92,000,000 of people, for on its consideration and enactment or defeat, in my judgment, rests the well-being and the prosperity of all of the people of the United States.

I represent a district agricultural in part—I think perhaps one of the best in the United States—and in part a manufacturing district. When I state that in my district there are many thousands of men in organized union labor, in mine and in factory, you will at once understand that I represent people who produce not only in the factory, but in the mine and on the farm. The output of coal from two townships in my own county is over 3,000,000 tons annually, and the output and development are rapidly increasing.

But, aside from the interests of my own district, I want to stand here and say that I am equally anxious to promote the welfare of every American citizen, whether in Greater New York, the mightiest of all our cities, in Chicago, the second city in the United States, or in Philadelphia, the third. I want to do what is best for all the people, North and South, East and West, as we stretch from 49° on the north down to the Gulf, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific. When I vote on this bill I vote for legislation that goes to every fireside, and I would not receive my own approval or retain my own self-respect if I stood attempting to array section against section, industry against industry, farmer against factory man, capitalist, or railroad man.

So I approach the discussion of this important bill from the standpoint of the best interests of all. That much by way of introduction.

It is proposed, on slight consideration, to vitalize into law an agreement that will throw, without let or hindrance, into the United States the market furnished by 92,000,000 of people the agricultural products of 8,000,000 people in Canada. Now, if this is to our advantage, in Heaven's name let us do it. If it be to our disadvantage, as we shall answer to our own self-respect and judgment, and later on to our constituents, let us not do it. And in cold blood I am going to inquire, as briefly as possible, whether it ought to be done or not.

REVENUE BILLS SHOULD NOT ORIGINATE WITH THE EXECUTIVE.

Mind you, so far as the country is concerned, so far as the Senate is concerned, so far as the House of Representatives is concerned, this bill, except by virtue of two amendments added to it, was not prepared in accordance with the Constitution. Our fathers wisely provided that revenue measures should have their origin in the House and that the Senate might amend.

They wisely provided that while the President may recommend legislation he only becomes a coordinate branch of the legislative body when the House and Senate have agreed on bills, which, if they are revenue bills, must originate in the House. Then he only has power to approve on the one hand or disapprove on the other, which disapproval is efficient, unless two-thirds of the House and Senate pass the bill notwithstanding that disapproval.

Here is a measure that was made in secret. Is there anybody within the sound of my voice on either side of this House, whether he is for or against this bill, far-reaching as it is, affecting every hearthstone, if vitalized, who will say that he knew anything about this agreement until we received the President's message, with the accompanying bill, which was formally introduced in the House at the last session by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL]? I pause for an answer. No man arises in his place in this great body and says he was consulted.

When we come to deal with foreign countries, the Constitution provides that a treaty made by the Executive, and vitalized by the approval of the Senate by a two-thirds majority, shall be the supreme law. What did our fathers mean when they provided in this manner for the making of treaties which should be the supreme law of the land? They knew that the world was large, with conflicting interests, diverse civilizations, governments differing in their organization. So the great power of negotiating treaties was placed in the hands of the President, but to become effective they must be vitalized by the concurrence of the Senate, not by a majority, not in a minute, not under the previous question, but after serious consideration in executive session and by a two-thirds vote. Looking in your eyes, Mr. Chairman, I say there have been treaties made even under the safeguards of the Constitution, after full consideration, that have not been wise.

Take the War with Spain. Ex-Speaker Reed once said, "When you go to war no man knows the end thereof." We went into that war because gentlemen on the other side, being in the minority, moved by a spirit of altruism, crossed on a little bit of politics, grew very patriotic, and we on this side also grew very patriotic. War was declared. The end thereof was the Philippines, responsibility for Cuba and for Porto Rico. To indicate that mistakes perchance may sometimes be made in the making of treaties, even with the two-thirds majority required in the Senate for ratification, we have the Philippines, in my judgment, for all time. We say on the stump, "Oh, we are going to civilize them and make them competent for self-government, and then we are going to tell them, 'Go forth and govern yourselves.'"

The treaty was concluded. Now, I am not speaking of the peerless leader, Mr. Bryan, to criticize; but it was necessary for him with his great personality to come to Washington and exercise his great influence to bring about the ratification of that treaty. He has been down here again performing the same function. [Applause on the Republican side.]

He put his strong hand and eloquent tongue upon his party friends in the Senate and the necessary majority was furnished to ratify that treaty. When a thing is accomplished I never grumble. I would not refer to it now did I not aim merely to illustrate how important it is in a government by the people under the Constitution to observe the law not only in the letter but in the spirit.

You may say that a government of the people is so wise and good and patriotic that no advantage can be taken of it. Nevertheless, when you deal with the nations of the world, when you deal, through the mother country, with our friends across the Canadian border, you want to be mindful of a favorite expression of an old constituent of mine who dropped now and then into a little bit of poetry. He was my client. He said: "This is an exceedingly important matter." I replied, "The plaintiff is not a bad man." "Oh," said he, "Mr. CANNON, you don't know him; he may not be bad, but when it comes to material matters he steeps his tongue in honey and clothes his feet in the cunning of a fox." [Laughter.] That is true not only of individuals and parties, but it is especially true of great countries.

NO AUTHORITY TO MAKE TRADE AGREEMENTS.

This bill is to carry out what is called a reciprocal trade agreement. Has the President any authority in law by which he can make such agreements? I will let Mr. PAYNE, former chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, answer that question. When Mr. PAYNE presented to the House the bill which bears his name and made his speech explaining and defending it, he was asked by Mr. Cox of Indiana:

Is there anything in this bill which would enable the President of the United States to negotiate any trade agreement with Germany?

Mr. PAYNE. There is not.

Mr. COX of Indiana. Is there any other law in effect that would still authorize him to do that?

Mr. PAYNE. No law, except the general provisions of the Constitution allowing him to negotiate treaties and submit them to the Senate.

Now, what are the objections to this bill; first, from the standpoint of the farmer, who comprises one-third of our population; and, second, from the standpoint of the other two-thirds? What is for the best interest of all the people? In considering this matter I crave the attention of the House, and I will try not to be tedious.

Our 92,000,000 people have just scratched the resources of the United States. The countries of Europe, including Great Britain, have a population of from 300,000,000 to 350,000,000 people. With a country far better than Europe in quality of soil, in mineral wealth, and in resources of every kind, we can, when fully developed, easily support with bread and meat and clothing and everything, save the products of the Tropics, 400,000,000 or 500,000,000 people.

How rapidly we have grown and developed. I am not an old man, but I recollect very well when there were but 17,000,000 people in the United States. I have observed a great many things since that time. I recollect very well when there were not 100 miles of railway in all the country west of the Allegheny Mountains. I recollect very well when the only market was found in New Orleans for all the great Mississippi Valley, and I might say almost for the whole Middle West was found in New Orleans. The flatboats floated down the Mississippi carrying our products, and the little steamer came back laden with the products received in exchange.

I know what it is to have seen Ohio, Indiana, Missouri to a great extent, and Michigan and Iowa and all that country of the great West brought partially under subjection. On the Wabash, where you could cut the malaria with a knife [laughter], where the timber was thick and heavy, there was no place to plant corn or sow wheat. They did not believe that men could live on the rich prairies of the West. It was supposed that they never would be settled. It was worth a man's life to cut down the forest and bring 80 acres under subjection in that timbered section, and then when he built a new house, costing from $700 to $800 in labor, he died. Of course he did, he was worn out.

There was the same struggle in Ohio, in Pennsylvania, and in New York; and let me say to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] that it was a long time after the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers before they extended settlement and development very greatly in New England. I am old enough to recollect the time when those splendid lands in Illinois and Iowa, which could be obtained on military land warrants at 70 cents an acre, were supposed to be good for nothing except grazing. No one ever dreamed that the time would come when the lands in the Genesee Valley in New York would depreciate in value by one-half or more. At that time the tide of immigration from the East to the West had not set in to any great extent. The railroads came, and when I speak of the railroads—and I do it with pride—I think of that great Democratic statesman, Stephen A. Douglas. The quickening hand of development never struck the State of Illinois until 1850, when, under the leadership of Mr. Douglas, then a Senator of national reputation, there was enacted a law granting land to the State of Illinois, the alternate sections being reserved. Under and by virtue of that act the Illinois Central Railroad was constructed from Chicago to Cairo and from Centralia to Dunleith. The alternate sections were snapped up in the twinkling of an eye at $2.50 an acre. Immigration set in. There was a chance to get to market. You all know the history of development since that time.

The war came—that great struggle that we all thank God resulted as it did. Then, from political and military necessity during the war it became necessary to begin the construction of a railroad to the Pacific coast. Deserts and mountains and Indians had to be overcome. The line ran through an uninhabited country, but that railroad was built in the fullness of time. Then came the Northern Pacific, and then the Southern Pacific, the Santa Fe, and the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul. Then came James J. Hill, that wizard among business men, a great man who leads in doing great things, and with him came the building of the Great Northern from Duluth, reaching across the continent to Seattle and the Pacific. As a result the western country was settled pretty rapidly.

CAUSE OF ABANDONED FARMS IN THE EAST.

But what was happening in the meantime down in New York and New England? While the rich prairie lands in Kansas, Nebraska, Iowa, Missouri, and Illinois were being developed—virgin soil, such as it seems to me God never made anywhere else on earth—what was happening in the East?

Many of the bright, enterprising boys took Horace Greeley's advice and went west. They went in great droves and helped to develop that country. Railroads were built and transportation charges were brought down until you could place a barrel of flour made from wheat grown in Minnesota or Illinois or Missouri, manufactured in Minneapolis or St. Louis, into the market of a little hamlet anywhere in New England for less money than you could haul it in a wagon 3 miles. [Applause.] The result was that the lands in the Genesee Valley in northern New York and in New England could not compete with the production of those lands in the West, where you had only to tickle the earth to have it fructify and bring forth in marvelous abundance fruits and cereals.

The farmers in many sections of the East were placed at such disadvantage that many farms were abandoned in Connecticut, in Massachusetts, in all New England, in New York, and, to some extent, in Pennsylvania. There were more than 7,000,000 acres in abandoned farms in New England and New York. There was also a reduction of $200,000,000 in the value of farm lands and buildings in the same States in those 20 years. In the period from 1880 to the year 1900, even in magnificent Ohio, which has not yet lost the capacity to breed and produce Presidents, the farmers suffered a decrease of $100,000,000 in the value of their farm lands in the presence of this competition from the West.

In developing the West we have sometimes suffered even from the excess of rich soil. I recall that upon the prairie in Illinois, within 50 miles of where I now live, with good railroad connections, with coal without limit deposited by the Almighty in the immediate neighborhood, I have seen corn, as good and sound as was ever grown, burned for fuel to keep the frost out. I merely speak of that to illustrate that our production was so great that the East, notwithstanding her decadence in agriculture, could not take our surplus. We had a long, weary road to travel, but men with brave hearts said "We want better markets; we will build more railroads"; and they got the railroads built.

It is needless to recount the growth and development of the middle and western sections of the country since 1860, when Abraham Lincoln was nominated as a candidate for the Presidency. Nor is it necessary to refer to the splendid cities that have sprung up—Chicago, the great market place for all the Middle West, which has grown from less than 100,000 people in 1860 to two and one-half millions of people, and countless other prosperous communities. It is, however, significant to note in connection with the consideration of this bill the remarkable, if not ominous, trend from the farm to the city, a movement which, in my opinion, will be stimulated by the enactment of this bill. To-day there is a far less percentage of people engaged in agriculture in the United States than there was in 1860. At that time more than one-half of our people were engaged in agricultural pursuits, while to-day the percentage is not over one-third. It is true that, aided by invention, with improved farm machinery, with the steam plow, the reaper, and the binder, one man on the farm now can do more than two or three men on the farm in the old days. But let us be honest; the same is true in all the walks of life. One man in a machine shop now can accomplish more than four men could have accomplished in 1860, until to-day the 92,000,000 people in the United States are producing more agricultural and more manufactured products—I measure my words in making the statement—than all Europe. That is a pretty strong statement, but it is true.

FREE LABOR V. SLAVE LABOR.

We fought out the economic question from 1861 to 1865. The Government's need for money, the necessity in the Northland to produce munitions of war, gave birth to the protective policy, and under it we prospered; while down South, with as good brain and brawn and as splendid manhood and womanhood as was to be found in the North they found difficulty in procuring proper arms and munitions and sufficient subsistence.

In that contest the great question touching labor was settled, and settled forever, in our country. The result was good for the North; it was good for the South; but it never would have been settled had it not been that roaming around in the body and brain of the average man, the mechanic and farmer, was a feeling that when a slave was doing in the South the work that elsewhere in the country was being done by an American sovereign, responsible for the control of the country, the dignity of labor was degraded.

With the close of that great struggle came an increased necessity for revenues to pay the Nation's debts, to pay pensions, to assist in the building of railways, to improve the great rivers and harbors, and the revenues were derived principally under the policy of protection. We said that the foreigner paid most of the tax; you said it was paid by the individual who consumed. Well, I can not stop your saying that, and you can not stop my saying the other; but, lo and behold, what have we achieved? Under this policy of protection we have prospered, until we now have over one-fourth of all the wealth of all the world, and it is better distributed amongst our 92,000,000 of people than is the wealth of any other nation in the world. Now, it may be that you Democrats could have done a great deal better, and if I were to make that charge you would confess it [laughter]; but there is no way of turning the hands back on the dial, and I suppose you will just have to accept the results, because if you had continued that policy of servile labor for which you fought, the South, instead of having a renaissance, instead of having improvement of land and all values, instead of having increased production by three, would now, in my judgment, be practically deserted.

But what has that got to do with Canada? I will ask to have the map brought in. I always believe in kindergarten instruction. [Laughter and applause.] I learned more readily in that way than in any other.

The time came when we found it was necessary to improve our agriculture; and I thank God for the instruction that is being given in our colleges, in our agricultural papers, and by our experts. I thank God that all over the country we are not wasting the natural resources of the soil as we did when corn was burned for fuel. We are improving all along the line now, and in no section is the improvement more noticeable than in the South.

I was born in North Carolina, and when 4 years old, in the arms of my mother, was moved over the mountains. The family went to the Wabash, and my good old mother never ceased mourning for the magnificent climate of North Carolina. My father, when a young man, helped to found a college down near Greensboro, N. C. A few years ago I accepted an invitation to attend its commencement. I arrived the day before the commencement, and I went around with Prof. Hobbs through the section of country in the vicinity of Greensboro.

PROSPERITY RETURNS TO THE SOUTH.

I visited the old farm where I was born, and found there every evidence of prosperity and thrift. As I remembered the place, it was crossed by deep gullies and was not good for very much. I asked the farmer how he got the land into such a prosperous state. He replied that he began by throwing a dam across each gully, so that the dirt washed in and leveled up the land. Then he had found the use of clover and cowpeas and improved the land, and that while he had paid only $10 an acre for it a few years before, he had within a few days refused $25 per acre. I asked if any other agency were at work in bringing about this increase than his own labor and intelligence. "Oh, yes," said he, "we have railroads and factories now. Over here at Greensboro they have large factories, and I find there a market for my chickens and eggs and all the small fruit I have to sell."

I was amazed at the evidences of progress on every side, and if I had been taken into Greensboro blindfolded I would have remarked, "How marvelously has the city of Peoria, or the city of Quincy, improved."

So that renaissance in agriculture is not only going on in New York and in New England, but is going on in the South. The quickening life of other industries furnishes a market.

I went out to the old Quaker graveyard and even there I could trace the progress of that country. The first little monuments were 2 or 3 feet high, but gradually higher ones were added, until the monuments of the last 8 or 10 years compare favorably with those erected in any prosperous community. The graveyard told the story.

I am interested in seeing North Carolina, Tennessee, Georgia, South Carolina, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, all the Southern States, diversify their industries and restore their lands.

With our enterprising people, the most enterprising in the history of the human race, the Mississippi Valley bottom lands will discount a dozen Niles in Egypt in production. I am anxious to see them reclaimed, and by the aid and cooperation of our 92,000,000 of people, as the Federal Government performs its function, the rivers tributary to the Mississippi will be made good outlets for the tile, and when that land is drained it is the best land on earth.

I want to ask—and I would like to have an answer from any gentleman on the other side from the Southland—Is it not true that in the last 10 years, certainly in the last 20 years, the value of your lands, improved and unimproved, has doubled and been multiplied by three? "Oh, well," you say, "we raise cotton down there, and we have a monopoly of that production."

But do you know that last year, with a bumper crop of corn, aggregating three thousand million bushels in the United States, you raised in the Southland, in addition to your valuable cotton crop, one-third of that great corn crop—a thousand millions of bushels?

You may say, "The wheat farmers over in Canada with their cheap lands do not bother us." I will show you in a moment. Counting Missouri, Kansas, Oklahoma, and Texas, the Southland produced almost one-third of the magnificent wheat crop of 1910. I will insert the actual figures later. If you did not raise a bushel of corn or a bushel of wheat or a bushel of oats or a bushel of barley or a bushel of potatoes, Irish or sweet, you would be interested. If you did not raise anything but cotton you would be interested, just as much as we of the Northland who do not raise cotton and who are liberal customers of yours, as you would be liberal customers of ours under the same circumstances. The South is growing more and more able to live within itself, and as she grows more and more able to do that her income will be greater and greater, and your fellow citizens all over the country will get their share as you get yours of the general prosperity.

Just here I want to call the attention of the honorable Speaker of the House to the interest the farmers of Missouri have in this bill. Missouri is a banner agricultural State. Her production of hay, oats, corn, barley, and fruits is enormous. In 10 years the value of Missouri farm lands has been more than doubled, and in 1910 that State produced more than 25,000,000 bushels of wheat.

I desire to inquire of my friend from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], who made a speech yesterday, what he will say to the people of Oklahoma, in whose growth and progress we all take pride, and which also produced in 1910 more than 25,000,000 bushels of wheat, when they complain that you have brought in competition with their products the almost illimitable production of Canada?

OUR OWN CITIZENS MUST DEFEND THE FLAG.

Recollect, if there is war, every citizen of the United States is called upon to defend the Republic. If there are school houses to build, if there are colleges to found, if there are railroads to maintain, if there are factories to construct, if labor is to be furnished, we can rely only on our own people. In the event of trouble, how much in taxes would Canada contribute for the preservation of the Republic? In the event of war, how many soldiers from Canada would fight the battles of the great Republic? How many of Canada's people would contribute to education in the United States? The college professors flourish and expound their delightful theories: "All mankind are brothers; all men are equal." Very good generalities, but all men are not equal from the intellectual standpoint. Some men are born simple-minded, some go to the insane asylum, some are weak, some are strong, some are wise, and some are wiser.

Mr. MURDOCK. And otherwise. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Yes; and otherwise. I am reminded that I have spoken an hour. I must hurry along, because there are several other matters I want to talk about.

Gentlemen, there come times in the history of a generation when those who have had the kindergarten instruction are in the minority. To the young who come in you may theorize and preach, but they know better, and 5 per cent of them—a percentage that holding the balance of power work a political revolution, five off one side and five on the other—have to learn through their stomachs what they do not learn through their heads. [Laughter.] This is true sometimes, not only of men in the shops, on the farm, and on the railways, but of men in office, and I have known it to be true of Members of Congress. [Laughter.] It is not a theory, whether it is your doxy or my doxy, that I care about, but facts. What will this bill do to us or for us?

It is 3,700 miles across Canada from ocean to ocean. Eight millions of people occupy that land, while we have 92,000,000. The countries were settled about the same time. The people of Canada are good people. We have had lots of them come to this country, and they have made good citizens. They came because it was for their interest to come. Now they have waked up. Great Britain is a wise country, a far-reaching country. The sun never sets on her possessions. Far away India, the Straits Settlements, Africa, Asia, Europe, North America—all in greater or less degree are under the magic wand of that great people. They are our brothers, our uncles, our fathers, and grandfathers, and if anybody thinks the people of Canada are fools they are mistaken. What have they in railway development?

Here (indicating on a map) is the Hudson Bay; here is the 49th parallel of latitude, the boundary between Canada and the United States. Canada has to-day, with 8,000,000 people, 24,000 miles of railway. We have 92,000,000 people, with a territory comparatively well settled, and we have 240,000 miles of railway. It is said our lands have been taken up, but there are large areas of public land in western Kansas, Nebraska, the Dakotas, Washington, and all over that great western country which, with improved agriculture and with better farming, all things considered, would make the best lands in the world.

It is said there is no danger from a free market with Canada so far as our wheat is concerned. Let us see about that. The President in his message says practically that this bill will eventually reduce the cost of living and will not reduce the price of the farmer's products in the United States. Our President is a great man and I have great respect for him. I voted for him, and I apprehend that I will vote for him again. I am not here to abuse him, but I would like to see him demonstrate the proposition that it will not impair the farmer's prices and yet will still reduce the cost of living. [Laughter and applause.]

CANADIAN RAILWAY DEVELOPMENT BY SUBSIDIES.

The Canadian Pacific Railroad stretches across the country to Vancouver, with substantially 10,000 miles in Canada and 4,000 miles in the United States. The 24,000 miles of railway built in Canada have received over $300,000,000 in aid from that Government and 55,000,000 acres of the best cereal producing land, excluding corn, on earth. The stock of the Canadian Pacific, as I recall, amounts to $1,300,000,000. My friend from New York says that is too high, that that is the amount of the stock of all the Canadian railroads. However, its stock yesterday, I believe—a 10 per cent stock, was quoted at 224 or 225. The stock of the Union Pacific Railroad, one of the best equipped railroads on earth, is a 10 per cent stock and has never defaulted, but it is quoted at about 170.

The Canadian Pacific has also great steamship lines aided by the Canadian Government to the extent of a million and a half dollars bounty annually, and those steamship lines reach Japan, Hongkong, Australia, and San Francisco, and run down the South American coast and across the ocean to Liverpool.

Then comes the Grand Trunk, running from Quebec and Montreal to Winnipeg, branching out with three or four lines and running up here [indicating on map] from Manitoba, through the two great Provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. I understand it is also extending its line by Government aid to the Pacific coast, and that the extensions are soon to be completed. Already there is another great transcontinental system, the Canada Northern, being constructed by Government aid. It is connecting up the smaller roads that have been constructed, touches Winnipeg, and will have a terminus on the Pacific coast at a point not yet determined upon, but in the vicinity of Prince Rupert. Already it has, if I remember aright, over 2,500 miles constructed, and I read in the New York Sun that it has contracted for the construction, I believe, of four or five hundred miles this year. So that all things considered, the railroad development in Canada is simply wonderful. What good are the railroads going to do? Why do they build them? To aid in the settlement and development of a vast territory capable of producing vast quantities of grain.

I speak of the President respectfully, because I entertain the highest respect for him, but if he makes a mistake touching a policy or recommendation it does not absolve me. I have a warrant from the people—not as many as he has a warrant from, but from the people that I represent in my vote here, and when I vote my vote affects also the people of New Jersey and Florida and all the country, and I must follow my own judgment. I have done so in the past, and, God helping me, I will in the future after investigation follow my judgment, whatever Presidents may recommend. [Applause.] His duty is to veto or approve my action when it reaches him, not to dictate it. [Renewed applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am a Member of this body, and proud of it. I believe in it. It has its duty under the Constitution, and God helping me, whoever is President, and however the Senate is composed, while I hold official position I will walk in the shadow of my own judgment as God gives me to see the light, although I tread the path alone. [Applause.]

The President in his message congratulates the country on the making of the so-called reciprocity agreement, and says in effect that we have been aided greatly in developing the United States by immigration from Canada. He says further—I do not quote him literally—that it is well for our patriotic, wise, and experienced farmers to go over into the promised land and help in the development of Canada. Now, let us see about that. In the last two years, if I recollect right, about 300,000 American farmers went over into Canada. But it is said, "That is a new country; don't you know, Mr. CANNON, that the people in the United States are to be greatly benefited by getting free wheat from that country," and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] says that the improved farms in Canada are worth as much as they are in New York, if I remember correctly.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman did not understand.

Mr. CANNON. Then, I will stand corrected.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman misunderstands a great many things.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, one thing at a time. I am not clothed with all wisdom; I do not have all kinds of statistical knowledge crowded into my head at all kinds of angles, and the power to defend the industries of Connecticut at one session of Congress and attack the industries of the balance of the country at another. [Cheers and applause.]

WHEAT LANDS IN CANADIAN NORTHWEST.

Now, how much wheat did Canada produce in the year 1909? In round numbers, if I recollect right, 166,000,000 bushels. Where was it grown? All except about 19,000,000 bushels grown in eastern Canada was produced in Manitoba, in far-away Saskatchewan, in far-away Alberta, with a very little bit in British Columbia. That shows what that new country can do. How much of the land there is under cultivation? Under cultivation in these three Provinces last year there were less than 12,000,000 acres. What says the deputy minister of agriculture of the Province of Alberta? George Harcourt, deputy minister of agriculture for the Province of Alberta, in 1909, made this report:

Of the country which is known the area capable of producing grain is 220,000,000 acres. The total area in crops last year was 11,257,879 acres, producing a total crop of 240,000,000 bushels. The unoccupied land in the future will produce at least 5,000,000,000 bushels. This is not the end. There is a great northern country, the McKenzie Basin, which is capable of producing grain. (Canadian Yearbook.)

I cite the following as to wheat production in the United States and Canada, and the figures are taken from official Government reports:

Wheat statistics.

		Bushels.
Wheat produced in United States, 1910		691, 767, 000
Wheat exported ——bushels	24, 257, 392
Flour exported 8,370,251 barrels=bushels	35, 666, 129	59, 923, 521
Wheat consumed in United States		631, 843, 479
Wheat produced in Canada, 1909		166, 744, 000
Wheat exported ——bushels	49, 000, 000
Flour exported 1,000,000 barrels=bushels	4, 500, 000	53, 500, 000
Wheat consumed in Canada		113, 244, 000
Wheat produced in Canada, 1909		166, 744, 000
Wheat produced in Manitoba ——bushels	52, 706, 000
Wheat produced in Saskatchewan ——do	85, 197, 000
Wheat produced in Alberta ——do	9, 579, 000
		147, 482, 000
Wheat produced in remainder of Canada		19, 262, 000

The three Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta produced this yield of wheat with less than 12,000,000 acres under cultivation. They have an available area suited to the cultivation of wheat of 220,000,000 acres.

AMERICAN FARMERS GO TO CANADA.

But some one says, "Mr. CANNON, our improved lands are substantially the same price as Canadian improved land." Granted. The price of improved lands in the farming districts of New York is substantially the same, as I understand, as those in Ontario, and perhaps the price of land in Massachusetts, Vermont, and New Hampshire is substantially the same as the price of land in Quebec and perhaps in Nova Scotia. I am only approximating; but let us see. When you lose an industrious farmer who understands the science of farming, with his wife and his children, you lose more than money. [Applause on the Republican side.] A few days ago Mr. Earling, manager of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad and brother of its president, did me the honor to call on me to pay his respects. I was glad to see him. I asked, "Are you carrying lots of home seekers on that great road of yours?" He replied, "A good many." I inquired, "Where are they going—to the Dakotas and on to Montana and Washington?" "No," he replied, "we are carrying more than we ever carried, but we are only carrying them as far as Minneapolis." I asked him why they stopped at Minneapolis, and he answered, "They transship for Manitoba and Saskatchewan and Alberta." One-half, two-thirds—yes; more than that—of the 200,000,000 acres of land in the Provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta—and a great portion of them are as good as the sun ever shone upon—may be homesteaded, and if a man lives on the homestead for a year and turns over the sod on 30 acres, he takes title in fee. Then he can buy an adjacent quarter section, if it has not yet been taken up, at the Government price. In addition, there is much of the 55,000,000 acres of land granted by the Government to the railways which is subject to settlement on favorable terms. And yet Liverpool fixes the price of our grain say my friends who agree with the President, and all this will not make any difference in the price!

Now let us inquire about that. The freight rate on wheat from Winnipeg to Liverpool is less than it is from Minneapolis to Liverpool. I have made inquiry about this, and I speak by the book. Will some gentleman be kind enough to explain to me in his own time why it is, under such circumstances, that the price of wheat, equal in quality, as shown by the report of the Tariff Board called for by a resolution of the Senate, averages from 10 to 12 cents more per bushel the year round in Minneapolis than in Winnipeg? Last year the magnificent crop of wheat in the United States, amounting to nearly 700,000,000 bushels, was all consumed in the United States except about 60,000,000 bushels.

What was the per capita consumption of wheat in the United States last year? Nearly 7 bushels. What a contrast that is to the condition in 1894. In that year, in spite of a good crop of wheat in the United States, conditions were bad. I am not stating why they were bad; I am not seeking to play politics by referring to what happened while the Democratic Party had full possession of the Government; but I call attention to it in order to illustrate the point. In the four years from 1893 to 1897 there was a minimum of consumption of wheat—not more than about 4 bushels to each inhabitant. If I recollect aright, for one year, 1894, it was less than 3½ bushels. In that year of lowest per capita consumption the price of wheat was the lowest we have had in 50 years—less than 50 cents a bushel to the farmer. What was the reason? Who buys the wheat after the farmer consumes his share? The other two-thirds of the people in the United States. A falling off in the consumption of wheat at the rate of 1 bushel to each inhabitant in the United States represents a loss of 92,000,000 bushels. Last year we had a great crop, and more than six-sevenths of it was consumed here. Less than 70,000,000 bushels of it went abroad.

Between 6 and 7 bushels per capita was retained in this country for consumption. Why? Because our people—the men on the railroads, the men in the factories, and in other branches—were fairly well employed. They received increased wages. There was a great cry raised by politicians, by the college professors, and others as to the high cost of living; and yet two-thirds of the people, I will say to the gentleman from New Jersey, earned sufficient wages to consume 6½ bushels of wheat to each man, woman, and child, and they had the wherewith to pay for it. In the four years from 1893 to 1897 the average consumption was a little less than 4 bushels per capita. Why? Hundreds of thousands of men were tramping; three or four millions of men were out of employment, or on short employment.

FARM PRICES OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS DECLINE.

Let us pursue that policy whereby we adjust our production so that it is consumed substantially in the United States. Let us do as other nations do, and pursue that policy which is for our best interest. When a man says to me that Liverpool fixes the price of grain for this crop of over 600,000,000 bushels of wheat, five-sixths of which is consumed in the United States, I say to him that I will believe him when he shows me that the tail wags the dog. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Since the election on the 8th day of November last, when our Democratic friends succeeded in carrying the House of Representatives by a majority of over 60, the farm price of agricultural products in the United States has decreased more than 25 per cent. The value of the product of labor and effort in other lines of industry, however, has not depreciated since that event. The wages of the employee in the factory, on the railroad, and in the mine have not been reduced, and I hope they will not be, although I could wish that there were a surer foundation for the hope than at present exists.

The cost of food products to the ultimate consumer, after they have passed through the hands of those who distribute, has not decreased in any commensurate proportion to the decrease in the farm price of agricultural products; in fact, prices at retail are almost as high, considering the season, as they were last November.

The farmer is not to blame for this condition. Although the farm value of his products has decreased over one-fourth, there have been no strikes on the part of the farmer. He is patient, patriotic, loyal, and is willing to bear his share of losses which come under the natural laws of trade. He is willing to submit to that law which should regulate all commerce in the United States, namely, the regulation of price by the supply and the demand.

I ask the question, What would have happened in the United States if the compensation of those who employ labor had been reduced one-fourth and if the wages of labor on railway, in factory, and in other industries had been cut in proportion? All over the country men now employed would be idle. There would be strikes, disorder, and panic, involving bankers, merchants, and the whole body politic.

Notwithstanding all this, the Democratic Party, with their enormous majority in the House, will pass this miscalled reciprocity bill, which will result in prosperity for our Canadian neighbors and bankruptcy for those engaged in agriculture in the United States.

This result may not come in a day, a week, or a month, but if this bill is enacted into law so long as it remains upon the statute book the situation will grow more and more acute, and while the burden will rest primarily upon those engaged in agriculture, no man lives to himself alone. Whatever injuriously affects the one-third of our population engaged in agriculture must inevitably react on and injure the other two-thirds. When the ability of the one-third to purchase the products of the other two-thirds is impaired, there must necessarily be a halting and slackening of production in all lines of industry, and we will have widespread panic and bankruptcy.

Some one says the northern railroads want this bill. Yes; some of them do; in fact, many of them do. One of the greatest men, in my judgment, in the United States, Mr. James J. Hill, a great railroad and empire builder, for whom I have the highest respect, heartily advocates this bill. He has builded a great railroad system from the Lakes to the Pacific Ocean, running near our northern boundary. I would rather agree with James J. Hill, Democrat as he is, than to disagree with him; but in my opinion the man is worse than an infidel who cares not for his own household. [Applause on the Republican side.] Here [indicating] is his railroad running up near the Canadian line, and you can count, as I have counted—and I think I have counted correctly—20 branch lines or spurs reaching over into this "poor" country of Manitoba, of Saskatchewan, and of Alberta. How poor that country is! Why, the eloquent gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], for whom I have great respect, in his speech made me wonder why there was so much fuss made about this proposed reciprocity agreement, for he seemed to prove, satisfactorily to himself at any rate, that this land would wear out in his lifetime or mine. Well, we have the reports in regard to it, and they show that it has a magnificent subsoil.

CLIMATIC CONDITIONS FAVORABLE TO WHEAT.

I went to the Weather Bureau to ascertain about the climate in these Provinces. I told them that I had read about the Japan current, that I had read about the long hours of sunshine during the crop season in northern Canada, and that I wanted to know about it. I asked them to make me a map, and after a week they sent me this one [indicating]. These red lines [indicating] are the heat lines. This one [indicating] starts away down here, not a great way from the central part of northern New York, and runs away up almost to 54° 40′. These lines indicate that they have as much heat in Canada during the crop season, and more, than in North Dakota. These other lines indicate precipitation. I think I have asked the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HANNA] more questions, perhaps, than anybody else in regard to this matter in my effort to learn about the section of the country in which he lives.

As I have said, the crop season is from April to August. I asked him, "How about the wheat lands up there?" "Why," said he, "they are all right." "Well," said I, "don't you get nipped with the frost?" He said, "Florida had her orange groves frozen a few years ago; you lost a wheat crop within your own recollection in Illinois and Iowa; you had the great corn crop in 1863 or 1864 absolutely killed before the middle of August. You have got to run those risks everywhere in the Temperate Zone, north or south."

Now, last year there was not enough moisture in North Dakota, and the crop was short about 5 bushels to the acre—the gentleman from North Dakota will correct me if my statement is inaccurate—but in Alberta, here, and in Saskatchewan, a little to the north, I think they raised in the neighborhood of 20 bushels to the acre. They had a little more moisture there. The dews were heavier. Farther north they had a little more sunshine. After the closest study I have been able to give the matter I have no hesitation in saying that in these three Provinces, without going into the McKenzie Basin, here [indicating], which reaches away up to the sixtieth degree of latitude and above, tempered by the current that comes from the Pacific Ocean and by the winds that down in the State of Washington are called the chinook winds, with the Rocky Mountains lower, with the Coast Range almost obliterated—I say to you there is as much moisture during the crop season throughout all this country here, up to Prince Rupert, including British Columbia, as there is in North Dakota; as much as there is in South Dakota and northern Michigan; and as much as at Port Arthur, in the magnificent Province of Ontario, which reaches down like a wedge between New York on one side and Michigan on the other.

The average temperature at Edmonton, 325 miles north of the border line between Canada and the United States, is the same as at Kalispel, Mont., and Port Arthur on Lake Superior.

Calgary, 150 miles north of the border line, has the same average mean temperature as Duluth, Minn., Alpena, Mich., Devils Lake, N. Dak., Cheyenne, Wyo., and Denver, Colo.

There is more rainfall in the crop season 100 miles north of Edmonton than in any part of the States of Washington, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, or northern North Dakota, and Minnesota, and the same rainfall as in North and South Dakota.

Calgary has the same precipitation as the northwestern part of the United States.

WE SHOULD CARE FOR OUR OWN.

Now, it is up to us to say whether we will care for our own. Will we continue to develop our own country from east to west and from north to south, or will we, without one iota of compensation, throw open our markets to all the agricultural products of the rapidly developing country in Canada?

Nations care for their own. These 92,000,000 of people of ours not only have to be strong enough, but wise enough, to face the world and pursue that policy that is the best for them.

Now, I want to say to the gentlemen from New York and Massachusetts and New England that in the last 10 years hundreds of millions of dollars have been added to the value of your farm lands—enough to make up for the loss sustained prior to 1900, while we were developing the great West.

New York and New England had 7,200,000 acres of agricultural lands abandoned between 1880 and 1900. There was a reduction of $260,000,000 in the value of farm lands and buildings in the same States in the same period.

Ohio also lost $91,000,000 in the value of farm lands and buildings in the same time.

Illinois increased the value of farm lands and buildings in the same time $756,000,000.

The losses in the East have been recovered in the last 10 years.

New England increased the value of farm lands and buildings $183,000,000 since 1900.

Connecticut had a loss of $24,000,000 in such values from 1880 to 1900 and a gain of $39,000,000 from 1900 to 1910.

Maine had a loss of $6,500,000 in such values from 1880 to 1900 and a gain of $61,000,000 in the last 10 years.

Vermont's loss for the 20 years prior to 1900 was $26,000,000, and her gain since that year $29,000,000.

New Hampshire lost $5,500,000 from 1880 to 1900 and gained $15,500,000 in the last 10 years.

Massachusetts lost $19,000,000 in the value of farm lands and farm buildings between 1880 and 1890 and gained $54,000,000 in the same values in the last 20 years, $33,000,000 of that increase being credited to the last 10 years.

Rhode Island lost $2,000,000 in similar values from 1880 to 1900, and gained $4,000,000 from 1900 to 1910.

The losses in value on farm lands and farm buildings from 1880 to 1900 in New England alone amounted to $83,000,000, and the gains in the same section in the last 10 years amounted to $183,000,000.

New York's farm lands and farm buildings were worth $168,000,000 less in 1900 than in 1880 and $288,000,000 more in 1910 than in 1900.

The Empire State in the last 10 years recovered her losses of the preceding 20 years and added $120,000,000 as a net gain over the values she had in 1880, when her farms began to decline.

The average value of farm lands per acre increased in the last 10 years as follows:

	Per cent.
Maine	75
Massachusetts	32
Vermont	30
Connecticut	43
Rhode Island	17
New Hampshire	40
New York	31
Pennsylvania	14
Illinois	106
Indiana	94
Iowa	120
Michigan	33
Minnesota	76
Missouri	104

So I say that the renaissance in agriculture has come to the East as well as the West, and by this legislation you propose to check that return of the American farmer to his old-time prosperity.

HARRISON AND BLAINE ON RECIPROCITY.

There has never been a time when Canada was not earnestly knocking at the doors of the United States for the admission, without tax or tariff, of her agricultural products. I do not care whether you call it reciprocity or free gift. Gentlemen will recall the treaty of 1854 and its subsequent repeal. I will not go back to that; that is behind us. In 1892 Canada, through the British minister, asked the administration of Benjamin Harrison, Blaine being Secretary of State, to receive delegates from Canada to cooperate with the British minister in making a reciprocity agreement. They came. Harrison tells it in a few words:

Here is what President Harrison said in his last message, December 6, 1892:

> During the past year a suggestion was received through the British minister that the Canadian Government would like to confer as to the possibility of enlarging upon terms of mutual advantage the commercial exchanges of Canada and the United States, and a conference was held at Washington, with Mr. Blaine acting for this Government and the British minister at this capital and three members of the Dominion cabinet acting as commissioners on the part of Great Britain.
> The conference developed the fact that the Canadian Government was only prepared to offer to the United States in exchange for the concessions asked the admission of natural products. The statement was frankly made that favored rates could not be given to the United States as against the mother country. This admission, which was foreseen, necessarily terminated the conference upon this question. The benefits of an exchange of natural products would be almost wholly with the people of Canada.

Now, what is a natural product? Oh, the air, the ocean, the mountains, the coal in the ground, the forest, the soil, the iron ore in the ground, the limestone for the flux, the clay for the brick. But when the coal becomes coke, when the clay becomes fire brick, are these products natural products? No; because the mining of the coal requires labor; the coking of the coal requires labor. The man who digs the fire clay puts into it his labor; the man who mines the iron ore contributes his labor. Wherever the hand of man makes matter assume a shape that is useful to the human family, when it leaves his hand it has ceased to be a natural product and has become a finished product. [Applause on the Republican side.] What temerity to call a product a natural product after it has been touched by the hand of labor! I believe this bill is greatly in the interest of Canada, without compensating benefit to the United States. In support of that view I want to quote from the report of the proceedings in the Canadian House of Commons. They have the English system in Canada, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier has been, I believe, prime minister for 16 years. He is a man of great ability and a candid man.

PREMIER LAURIER SAYS IT BENEFITS CANADA.

In addressing the Canadian House of Commons on March 7 on this proposed, miscalled reciprocity agreement, amongst other things Sir Wilfrid Laurier said:

We—

Referring to Canada—

> are, above all, an agricultural people. Our chief wealth is the growth of these products of the Temperate Zone. What are they? Fruits, cereals, and vegetables; and it is our boast—not an idle boast, but a boast founded on actual experience—that in cereals, vegetables, and fruit we can, without exaggeration, beat the world.

Will you accept Mr. Laurier as a proper witness? Again, he says:

> All that we ask under these resolutions is to obtain for the man who works in the field the best possible remuneration for his labor.

And then he compliments the minister of finance, Mr. Fielding, and the minister of customs, Mr. Patterson, who negotiated in secret this agreement with our Secretary of State. If the people of the United States had been informed what they were up to, in my judgment, their indignation would have thundered throughout the country until no Secretary of State would have dared make the agreement. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Sir Wilfrid Laurier thanks these two men for having obtained from the United States such an advantageous arrangement, and having obtained it without the sacrifice of any Canadian interest. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] Again, Sir Wilfrid Laurier says:

> I stated a moment ago that the agreement we made is simply to get better prices for the products of the Canadian farmer.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, that is the statement of the man who is responsible for the Canadian Government. The man responsible in an executive capacity for our Government says: "No; Sir Wilfrid, you are wrong."

Again Mr. Laurier says, and I want your attention to this:

> Then there is the cattle trade. Years ago we had a cattle trade with Great Britain. We have some yet, but it is not as large as it ought to be, because everybody knows that it has been constantly retarded by the exchange embargo put upon it some 20 years ago or so, and therefore if we are not able to sell all the cattle we can raise in Great Britain, there is a ready market in the United States.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Again, the Canadian premier says:

> We are exporters not of manufactured products, but of natural products, and we are large importers of manufactured products; and we have given to the Americans a free entrance to our markets only for their natural products, as they have given us a free entrance to their market for our natural products.

Again, he says:

> It is not a great effort of imagination to suppose that the Americans were far more concerned about obtaining reciprocity in manufactured products than in natural products; but our negotiators would not consent to any reciprocity in manufactured products, but insisted on limiting the agreement simply to such manufactured products as agricultural implements.

Mr. Laurier is a remarkably candid and square man. He wants this legislation for the protection and benefit of the agriculturists in Canada. I am against it, because I believe it will work grave injury to the one-third of our people engaged in agriculture and inevitably to all our people, because if the agriculturist does not prosper, if his lands are sold for taxes, if his numbers decrease, if his production falls off, if he becomes a starvation consumer for the factories in Connecticut and in Massachusetts that weave the clothing, the whole people are bound to suffer.

STEEL TRUST FAVORS THE AGREEMENT.

Now I want to refer to one or two other matters. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] represents that great district in which Birmingham is situated, where God Almighty, when he threw matter into space, placed side by side the iron ore and the limestone and the coal. It is said that the great United States Steel Corporation—and I have no abuse for it as long as it performs its functions for the benefit of all the people—has so large an interest in the district which my friend represents that it is very desirous that this bill should pass. My information is accurate, for I have it in black and white from a man who ought to know.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I want to state to the gentleman from Illinois that I am not in the confidence of the United States Steel Corporation. They do own about one-third of the iron ore in my district, a very valuable property. I am satisfied the gentleman from Illinois can inform the House as to its plan of procedure better than I can. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CANNON. After all, that is gratuitous. I did not speak of the gentleman personally in connection with this matter. I spoke of the factors in his district, which is being so magnificently developed. I want to say that if he could construe what I said into a reflection on him personally, it seems to me he would have to strain the construction.

Now, I will look my friend in the eye and say that I never, directly or indirectly, had any interest in the United States Steel Corporation, nor did any relative of mine. That great corporation may or may not be violating the law. If it is, let it be prosecuted. But, as it is a great corporation, and as I have, as I think, been reliably informed that it believes this agreement ought to be ratified, I made that statement.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. In what I said I intended to make no reflection on the gentleman's personality, but merely meant to imply that the gentleman, speaking from the standpoint of the Republican Party, must of necessity be very much closer to the Steel Corporation than I was, speaking from the standpoint of the Democratic Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. That is the case with all industries.

Mr. CANNON. I am proud of all the industries in this great Republic—the railroads, the factories, and the furnaces. I am proud, also, of the great development brought about by that great organization the Standard Oil Co., no member of which I have any personal knowledge of directly or indirectly. Its fleets are upon every ocean. Its production is magnificent. It reaches with its pipe lines into the districts represented by my colleague, Dr. FOSTER, and myself. Our constituents, Doctor, were exceedingly anxious to get them to construct their pipe lines, and now that they have got them, I fancy that, while some of our constituents are very anxious to damn them, they would not have them turned out. [Laughter.] The American people have worked and are working out their own salvation.

THE FREE-LIST BILLS OF 1894.

Now, then, one word more. I hold in my hand the bill reported, as I understand, this morning by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], placing on the free list agricultural implements and various other articles. Already in the Payne law, which has been so cursed and damned, any country can have free trade with us in agricultural implements provided it grants a like concession to us. You now propose to go further. You say to Great Britain, and you say to every foreign manufacturer of agricultural implements, come in without price and enjoy the markets of 90,000,000 of people without yielding anything in return. Canada levies, I believe, a tariff of from 12½ per cent to 20 per cent on agricultural implements.

This is not the first time the Democrats have passed popgun tariff bills through the House. I was here when the Wilson law was passed. I saw the virile Democratic majority run the steam roller over the minority, and agree en bloc to 600 Senate amendments without dotting an i or crossing a t. That was pretty bad. Cleveland said the bill was a measure of perfidy and dishonor, and he let the bill become a law without signing it. But it became a law all the same, and the present honored Speaker of the House [Mr. CLARK] spoke and voted for it. Then what happened? The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Springer, a Democratic Member, rose in his place and offered a popgun bill, putting iron ore on the free list. They just rushed it through by the aid of the steam roller. Then, I think, bills placing coal and several other articles on the free list were passed in the same way. The Democrats in the House said, "We will show the people that we are willing to make a free list." They thought that was fine politics. We were just entering upon the campaign in the fall of 1894, and after that election the Republican Party came back into the House with a majority of something like 120. Oh, yes; you passed the Wilson bill as you propose to pass the reciprocity bill—without amendment—and you passed popgun bills putting numerous articles on the free list, just as you propose to do now. When I was a boy I read about that wonderful bird, the ostrich, with its small head and great body, and when it wanted to hide it stuck its head in the sand. I used to wonder how that ostrich looked. I saw how it looked when you passed those bills. [Laughter.] History repeats itself.

Pass your popgun bills through, but they will not, in my judgment, serve you any better than similar bills served your ostrich brethren in 1894.

"Oh," it is said, "we must pass this bill as it is, because if it is amended Canada won't have it." Who is legislating for the United States—we or Canada? [Applause on the Republican side.] A treaty made under the auspices of Great Britain, between Canada and France, was hung up in the French Senate for months. It was said that it must not be amended or Canada would not have it; but the French amended it, and provided that fattened cattle coming into France on the hoof should not come in under the minimum tariff, but should pay the maximum tax. They amended it from the standpoint of the interest of the people of France.

The treaty went back to Canada. The negotiations were ended if Canada did not accept the amendment. Canada did accept the amendment. Canada has not yet acted upon this measure. Would it not be well enough to let Canada speak for herself? Gentlemen, you may pass this bill, and if it is enacted into law and disaster comes on account of it, the American sovereign, as you will find out, has a keen eye and a long recollection. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It has been stated that the adoption of the reciprocity agreement will increase our trade with Canada. On evidence that would be strong enough to impel me to act upon matters of great importance to myself or my country, I say that is not its object at all. Have you noticed the figures of our imports into Canada?

CAN WE IMPROVE OUR TRADE WITH CANADA?

To those who urge that the ratification of the proposed reciprocity agreement will expand our trade with Canada and widen the market in that country for American production, let me quote from the Canada Yearbook for 1909 the figures of imports.

In 1909 the total imports into Canada were $309,756,608. Of this amount, $192,661,360 came from the United States; $86,257,557 from the British Empire, including Newfoundland; and $30,837,691 from all other foreign countries. In other words, the United States sent into Canada in the year 1909 $75,566,112 more in products than all the rest of the world, including Great Britain and the British possessions.

As showing the growth of the trade of the United States with Canada, the percentages furnished by the Canada Yearbook are even more illuminating, showing, as they do, that the United States has gradually, year by year, increased its trade with Canada until in the year 1909 59 per cent of the total imports into Canada came from the United States.

In 1868, when the Dominion Government was organized, the percentage of imports from Great Britain into Canada subject to duty was 64.78 of the total imports subject to duty; and the percentage of imports which came in free was 39.82 of the total imports which came in free. In the same year the percentage of imports from Great Britain and the British possessions dutiable and free to the total imports dutiable and free was 56.06.

The percentage of imports from the United States to Canada for the same year subject to duty was 22.93 of the total imports subject to duty, and the percentage of imports from the United States which came in free was 53.96 of the total imports which were admitted into Canada without payment of duty. The percentage of all imports from the United States dutiable and free to the total imports dutiable and free was 33.77.

Since the year 1868 the proportion of imports from Great Britain to Canada to imports from the United States has steadily decreased until in 1909 Great Britain sent to Canada only 29.84 per cent of the total dutiable imports admitted to Canada, 16.31 per cent of the total imports admitted into Canada free of duty, and 24.52 per cent of the total imports of Canada.

The percentages of the United States, on the other hand, had increased, until in 1909 we sent to Canada 51.76 per cent of her total dutiable imports, 70.20 per cent of her total free imports, and 59 per cent of her total importation, dutiable and free.

The average for the 42-year period from 1868 to 1909 for the respective countries of Great Britain and the United States is as follows:

Imported from Great Britain.

	Per cent.
Dutiable to total dutiable	41.24
Free to total free	22.59
Dutiable and free to all imports	34.49

Imported from the United States.

	Per cent.
Dutiable to total dutiable	43.15
Free to total free	65.75
Dutiable and free to all imports	51.24

It is interesting and instructive to note the average ad valorem rate of duty paid by American imports into Canada in comparison with the average on imports into Canada from Great Britain and other countries. In spite of the Canadian preferential tariff in favor of Great Britain, the figures show that the lowest average ad valorem rate is paid by imports from the United States. I quote the following figures taken from the Canada Yearbook, 1909 (p. 225):

	Per cent.
Average ad valorem rate on dutiable imports into Canada from Great Britain, 1909	25.755
Average ad valorem rate on dutiable imports into Canada from the United States, 1909	24.868
Average ad valorem on all imports into Canada from Great Britain, 1909	19.028
Average ad valorem on all imports into Canada from the United States, 1909	13.247
Average ad valorem on dutiable imports into Canada from all countries, 1909	27.315
Average ad valorem on all imports into Canada from all countries, 1909	16.586

When Canada wanted to make a reciprocity treaty with the United States in Harrison's administration they asked permission that they might come to Washington and treat. The pending agreement was initiated upon our invitation, not upon theirs, and it is the first instance of the kind in the history of the country.

FREE PRINT PAPER THE ISSUE.

What are we to gain by such an agreement? We have the lion's share of trade with Canada, and at a less ad valorem than any other country on earth. Why did this invitation go? What was there that caused this agreement to be initiated without the Secretary of State taking the American people into his confidence? Now, I am going to present the evidence to you, you being the jury. There has been a good deal of talk, running over several years, about the price of print paper. I have not been under the tongue of good report with the publishers of our metropolitan newspapers and magazines. I only refer to it to illustrate the situation. I have no feeling about the matter. It is behind us. The publishers can not now change it, nor can I.

The Committee on Ways and Means in the Sixtieth Congress was headed by Mr. PAYNE, Mr. MCCALL, Mr. DALZELL, and others being members. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS introduced his free print-paper bill, and it went to that committee. As I am informed, the committee by a unanimous vote, including the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], then and now a member of that committee, postponed the bill for that session of Congress, and did not even hold hearings on it. I was Speaker. They unloaded on me. [Laughter and applause.] The minority in the House had inaugurated a filibuster that lasted to the end of the session. It was ably lead by Mr. WILLIAMS, now a Senator from Mississippi. We had a stormy time. Newspaper publishers, through their representatives, one of whom I will name, Mr. Herman Ridder, came to me, demanding that I should do something which had never been done, so far as I know, in the history of the Republic—that I should recognize some Member, JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS or some one else, on a Monday—suspension day—and move to discharge the Committee on Ways and Means from further consideration of that bill and pass it.

I said that I could not do that; that it would not be just to my party. I said, "This is no time, on the eve of a presidential election, to take such action, and by doing so, if I had any regard for my personal welfare, I would subject myself to legitimate criticism, lose the respect of the minority, receive the condemnation of the majority, and the disapproval of the country." [Applause.]

There was some nasty talk, to which I will not refer, and it is not necessary to do so; but I have been hammered from that time to this, though I believe they have let up on me now, inasmuch as I am no longer the Speaker, and I am enjoying a little season of rest. It is all right. I am 75 years old, and, whatever they do, when I appear at the gate of either of the places where men go hereafter [laughter], whether I go where they wear asbestos halos or those of muslin, I will walk with my head erect and say, "I retain my own self-respect." [Loud applause.]

I am not going far into the matter here. I am going to run over the personal part of it as rapidly as possible. Many things happened about that time, and threats were made that if the Republican Party did not promptly put print paper upon the free list that great and good man who headed the Publishers' Association, Mr. Herman Ridder, would support Mr. Bryan for the Presidency and contribute $100,000 to his election.

We did not pass that bill, and when the time came Mr. Ridder was made treasurer of the Democratic national committee, and I guess he gave you boys on the Democratic side $50,000, did he not? [Laughter.] The newspapers say so, and I have never seen it denied. So much for that.

COST OF PRODUCTION HERE AND IN CANADA.

I recollect very well that under the hot attack upon myself personally, and upon the party of which I was a member, I looked about for some means of defense, and I introduced a resolution creating a special committee to investigate the condition as to print paper. When the resolution was agreed to, I appointed that committee, and my honorable colleague [Mr. MANN] was made chairman. The House will recall the high personnel of that committee, and will agree that it worked industriously. But from one end of the country to the other I was criticized for that action by resolutions passed by the Publishers' Association and by denunciations in the newspapers. The committee made an honest investigation, and in the fullness of time they submitted a report. They found that there was a difference of $2 a ton between the cost of production in Canada and the cost of production in the United States. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I recall, stated, if not in the report, on the floor of the House, that that was as near as they could get it to the actual difference. It was a unanimous report, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] and the other Democrat on the committee concurring.

This House in the consideration of the Payne tariff bill accepted the recommendation of the Mann special committee and fixed the duty on print paper at $2. The bill went to the Senate, where there is no previous question. The Mann report was not accepted by that body, and they fixed the duty at $4 a ton. In the compromise effected between the Senate and the House—and all legislation is a compromise—the rate was made $3.75 a ton, a reduction from $6, the rate under the Dingley law.

In this connection, allow me to call the attention of the House to the difference between the Tariff Board and the Mann special committee on this matter. The Mann committee reported that $2 would represent the difference, whereas the Tariff Board said that $4.14 represented the difference. (S. Doc. 849, 61st Cong., 3d sess.) In this bill you reject both reports and propose to let it in free.

I hold no power of attorney to defend the paper industry. I have not a constituent, so far as I know, who has an interest in it. If it be true that the difference in the cost of production of this material in Canada, or anywhere else on earth, and the United States is $2 a ton or $4 a ton, then that difference ought to measure the tariff rate. I say that because I am a protectionist. Beyond that I have no interest.

The New York World claims that there is $798,000,000 capital invested in the printing trades, and admits that the product last year was valued at $857,000,000. Is there any other industry in this country whose annual product is valued at more than its entire capital?

By the industrial census of 1905 there were $385,000,000 capital invested in these trades, including books, newspapers, periodicals, etc., and the annual product was $496,000,000. Three-fifths of the capital and product was credited to the newspapers and periodicals, as follows:

Capital	$239,518,524
Salaries	47,128,711
Wages	59,830,768
Incidental expenses	67,638,099
Materials	70,358,000
Product	309,327,606

The combined cost of production, including salaries, wages, materials, incidental expenses, amounted to $244,955,578. Subtracting this from the value of the product, $309,327,606, leaves $64,372,028, which is a trifle less than 27 per cent of the capital.

Patent medicines and women's clothing were the only other industries that equaled this percentage of profit on investment in that census.

By the census of 1905 it was also shown that nearly 60 per cent of the income of newspapers and periodicals, including country weeklies, came from advertising and little more than 40 per cent from subscriptions and sales.

It is claimed by the New York World that the product of the printing trade is now valued at $857,000,000, or nearly double what it was five years ago, and it is admitted that the income from advertising yields a greater ratio of the whole income than it did it 1905.

ADVERTISING AND THE HIGH COST OF LIVING.

The advertising bill of this country is placed at more than $500,000,000 a year. This is from the printing trade alone. Add to this the cost of electric and mechanical advertising, and it is estimated that we are spending between $700,000,000 and $800,000,000 a year for advertising—to induce the people to purchase.

So, my Democratic friends, advertising is one of the items in the high cost of living.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. And it is on the free list. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Yes; absolutely on the free list.

The total value of all farm property in 1900 was given at a little more than $20,000,000,000, and it is now estimated at more than $30,000,000,000, while the total value of all produce from the farms of the United States last year is given by the Secretary of Agriculture at a little less than $9,000,000,000.

According to the figures given in the President's message, there was less than $6,000,000 worth of wood pulp and print paper imported from Canada last year, and we are asked to open the doors and jeopardize the farmers' market for nearly $9,000,000,000 worth of produce to enable the publishers to get less than $6,000,000 worth of paper and pulp at a less cost than they have had to pay, when they are making 27 per cent on their invested capital.

This wood pulp and print paper is the one item in the agreement on which there is no reciprocity. Mr. Fielding, in his letter to Secretary Knox, made this perfectly clear. He said:

In the meantime the present duties on pulp and paper imported from the United States into Canada will remain.

The Canadian duty on print paper is 15 per cent.

The six cities of New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Boston, and Baltimore have one-half of the whole publishing business of the United States, and it is easy to account for the enthusiastic demands for the ratification of this agreement by the publishers of those great centers of population whether the dwellers in those cities are equally clamorous or not.

The proposed reciprocity agreement should be labeled "the publishers' pact," whereby agricultural products are traded off for the publishers' profits.

I have inquired to some extent as to the capital and profits of some of the great newspapers and magazines. I recollect I made inquiry about one—the only one, perhaps, that ever perpetrated a criminal libel upon me in all my public or private life. The one to which I refer was committed by a man named Higgins, who published Success. I had a lawyer friend who agonized with me to bring a criminal action and civil action against him for libel. So I caused an inquiry to be made, and the information came back that the concern and some of its stockholders were so insolvent that nothing would be found on execution to satisfy a judgment against them. [Laughter.]

Now, I do not hate the newspapers. I know many of their publishers, editors, and correspondents. I have the highest respect for them. The metropolitan newspapers and magazines have access to the people. In my last campaign I covered my district by automobile, taking my constituency into my confidence. They knew, after the years I had represented them and lived with them, that I would tell the truth. When I could not get the truth into the metropolitan newspapers, the country newspapers came to my rescue. God bless the country newspapers. [Applause.] They are a part of us. When we are married and given in marriage they tell the good news. They go to our weddings and our funerals. They rejoice with us when we rejoice and mourn with us when we mourn. [Applause.] One reason why I am against the parcels post is because it is in the interest of strangers. We know the local merchant and the commercial traveler. They belong to our churches and to our clubs. They help make our civilization; they are acquainted with our farmers and our farmers are acquainted with them; but we do not know the mail-order houses.

I do not know the men who own the enormous metropolitan papers. They have heard of me, but they do not seem to care much about me. [Laughter.] I am not complaining. I am not seeking justification. If they do not let me alone, I will not quit public life, if I get my way about it, until my constituency asks me to retire. [Applause on the Republican side.]

WHY THE PUBLISHERS WANT RECIPROCITY.

I have referred to Herman Ridder. A friend of mine who publishes a country newspaper sent me this:

AMERICAN NEWSPAPER PUBLISHERS' ASSOCIATION, WORLD BUILDING,
New York, March 15, 1911.

DEAR SIR: May I invite your attention to the point that promptness in ratifying the reciprocity agreement of the United States with Canada is of the utmost importance to newspapers?

There is danger in amendments, or changes, or delay.

[Laughter.]

The two Governments had a tacit understanding that the arrangement would go through as framed. The difficulties attending ratification on the Canadian side may be increased greatly if there is hesitation or an attempt on our part to make a new trade.

Will you kindly urge, through your publication and by letters to your Representative and Senators, that the agreement as made by the State Department be passed speedily by Congress and without amendment?

Yours, faithfully,

HERMAN RIDDER,
President American Newspaper Publishers' Association.

[Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Now, I have another:

[Established 1844.]

CHICAGO DAILY JOURNAL,
Chicago, Ill., November 18, 1910.

This is dated before the making of the reciprocity agreement—

MY DEAR SIR:—

I want the Democratic Members to listen to this and see if they will not recognize this delightful letter. Stand up now and bear testimony—

I want you all to get up and sing "Renew my courage, Lord," and say whether you got this letter. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

MY DEAR SIR: The independent press—

This is one of the independent fellows. [Laughter.]—

The independent press of the country, and a large part of the Republican press, supported Democratic candidates this year because Republican Senators and Representatives did not keep their word in regard to removing the tariff on paper.

In my opinion the way to insure the continued support of these publishers through the campaign of 1912 is to put all print paper, pulp, and all material entering into the manufacture of paper on the free list at the earliest possible moment, and to announce now that that will be the policy of Democrats in Congress.

Yours, truly,

JOHN C. EASTMAN.

Is there anybody on the other side of the House who did not get one of these letters? [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] If so, let him arise and say so. No one arises.

It does not make much difference to me what somebody said in the past or what somebody did in the past so long as they do not violate the law. What they said and did may sometimes be useful as an example and admonition, but it does not shed much light on the present or on the future. Yet there have been so many efforts to drag in the name of William McKinley, by whose side I sat for 16 years when he was an honored Member of this House, that I want to clear the matter up a little bit. Somebody has got to defend the dead.

M'KINLEY'S RECIPROCITY POLICY.

McKinley held to the Republican theory of reciprocity in noncompeting products. In his opening speech on the McKinley bill in the House of Representatives, May 7, 1890, speaking of reciprocity, he said:

We have been beaten in every instance. From 1854 to 1866—12 years of reciprocity with Canada—we bought of them twice as much as they bought of us. Ninety-five per cent of their products came into the United States free of duty, while only 42 per cent of ours went into Canada free of duty. Mr. Chairman, what these other countries want is a free and open market with the United States. What we want, if we ever have reciprocity, must be reciprocity with equality, reciprocity that shall be fair, reciprocity that shall be just, reciprocity that shall give us our share in the trade or arrangement that we make with the other nations of the world.

It will be seen, Mr. Chairman, that wherever we have tried reciprocity or low duties we have always been the loser.

President McKinley did not advance upon any new ground in 1901. He said at Buffalo substantially what he had said in his first inaugural address March 4, 1897. Here is the reciprocity paragraph from his inaugural address, and I challenge anyone to find any other or different policy set forth in his Buffalo speech:

In the revision of the tariff especial attention should be given to the reenactment and extension of the reciprocity principle of the law of 1890, under which so great a stimulus was given to our foreign trade in new and advantageous markets for our surplus agricultural and manufactured products. The brief trial given this legislation amply justifies a further experiment and additional discretionary power in the making of commercial treaties, the end in view always to be the opening of new markets for the products of our country by granting concessions to the products of other lands that we need and can not produce ourselves and which do not involve any loss of labor to our own people, but tend to increase their employment.

That is just what President McKinley said in the beginning of his administration when he gave notice that he would call the Congress to meet in extraordinary session on March 15, 1897, to revise the tariff on protection lines, and it is substantially what he said in his last public utterance at Buffalo in September, 1901.

What did McKinley say at Buffalo? Here it is:

By sensible trade arrangements, which will not interrupt our home production, we shall extend the outlets for our increasing surplus. * * * We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industry and labor. * * * What we produce beyond our domestic consumption must have a vent abroad. The excess must be relieved through a foreign outlet, and we should sell everywhere we can and buy wherever the buying will enlarge our sales and production, and thereby make a greater demand for home labor.

McKinley's idea of reciprocity was to provide an outlet for our surplus production; the pending reciprocity measure is an attempt to cheapen our consumption.

McKinley sought to increase our exports; this proposes to increase our imports. The two schemes are radically different.

Oftentimes when McKinley's Buffalo speech is quoted the words "without harm to our industry and labor" are omitted. I indorse every word of that speech. It is in harmony with his official life and his action as a legislator. I have always been for that policy announced by McKinley and always expect to be for it.

I recollect that a great candidate for office in 1904 read that extract; but he left out the words "without harm to our industry and labor," so that it would read, "We should take from our customers such of our products as we could use." I had to meet that quotation frequently, and I could always meet it in a sentence. Gentlemen will recall the old story about the infidel and the preacher. The infidel said that he could prove by the preacher's own Bible that there was no God. "Show me," said the preacher. The infidel turned over and found one of the chapters which David is supposed to have written, and he said, "There it is." It read, "There is no God." But the parson had read his Bible. He said, "You scoundrel, take your thumb off and read it all." And when he did so, it read, "The fool saith in his heart there is no God." [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I had no idea I should talk so long. I am a Republican and a protectionist. I indorse the Republican policy announced in the Republican platform of 1908. I believe in it, and I will support it; but I beg gentlemen to recollect that there is nothing perfect that comes from the hand of man, and there never will be enacted a tariff bill satisfactory in every particular to any man. Perfection comes from God alone, who has all wisdom and all power.

I voted for the Payne-Aldrich bill. I agree with the President in what he said at Winona, that it is the best protective-tariff bill ever passed. I still believe that. If I had supreme power, I would wipe out some things in it. I could find duties here and there which might be lowered, and I want to tell the truth and say that I could find here and there an article on the dutiable list with a duty that is not protective, or an article on the free list which, if placed on the protective list, would have founded great industries.

HYSTERIA HALTS PRODUCTION.

Hysteria has been promoted by the great publishers. They can do a great deal in destroying parties and wiping out individuals, but they can not do as much as they could have done two years or four years ago. [Applause.] When this proposed agreement is vitalized by legislation, when you hold the country up with the threat of tariff revision, to get rid of the Payne law, which the President said—and I think, substantially, all on this side agree with him—was the best protective tariff bill ever passed, though not perfect, you make men fearful. The farmer buys 5 per cent or 10 per cent less; the man with a fixed income buys a little less; and the laborer on the railway or elsewhere buys a little less; and when you reduce by 5 per cent the capacity of our 92,000,000 people to consume, you close factories, you cut down wages, you beget strikes. You ought to recollect that, my Democratic friends. Some of you were living in 1894, and some of you were here; but there are many of you who have come in since who will have to learn by kindergarten instruction.

Now, I want to say to men on this side of the House that I am somewhat full of cumbativeness. Sometimes I seem to have temper when I have none, and sometimes I have temper when I think I am under unjust charge; but when matters are behind me, I say again, as I have said on a former occasion, there is nothing in animate nature that I would harm or punish. I never expect to agree with all of you, and most of you, perhaps, will not agree with opinions I may hold; but we must cooperate; we must stand together or hang separately. [Laughter.] We are in the minority. We are not responsible for legislation. The Democrats are responsible. Our office is criticism, and I think we are perfectly able to perform the duties of that office. [Laughter.]

I want to say to my New England friends, to my Missouri friends, to my Illinois friends, and to all men who share the Republican faith, that if the Republican Party is to live, it can live only by being true to and supporting the policy of protection, under which the men who live in the sweat of their faces, bearing the burdens of the most expensive civilization on earth, receive $2, as compared with $1 received by labor in other countries of the world; by equalizing production in our own country and keeping our own markets.

Gentlemen from Massachusetts, gentlemen from the Keystone State, the citadel of protection, the great State that through evil and good report has always kept the Republican faith, may hug to their breasts the delusion, on account of all that has been said as to the high cost of living, that they want you to vote for this measure; but, Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned, without regard to what others may think, God helping me, I will keep the Republican faith; and after the majority, substantially in solid phalanx, vitalizes this outrageous legislation, I would sooner take my chances in 1912 as an adherent of Republican doctrine.

To you gentlemen from Massachusetts I will say that I love Massachusetts. She has done more, perhaps, than any Commonwealth in the Union in shaping the sentiment and promoting the civilization of the people of the great Republic. Did you vote for Foss in the last election? Is he to represent the permanent public sentiment in Massachusetts? When the penalty is paid, as it will be paid between this and the year 1912, and consumption and production are restricted and decrease, are you still going to support him? Is he your leader? This bill might well be labeled, "A bill by the grace—or punishment—of God, the aid of the Secretary of State, and Foss, of Massachusetts, and the almost solid vote of Democratic Members." Choose ye! [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman takes his seat I will ask him if he will permit a question?

LIVERPOOL DOES NOT FIX THE PRICE.

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; if it is apt.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I have been very greatly interested and entertained by the remarkably able speech of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois. Toward the close of it he said he was a protectionist and a Republican. I, too, am a protectionist and a Republican, and I wish to ask him this question, and to say before asking the question this, that I never as a Republican claimed that the price of wheat in the United States was not fixed in Liverpool. The gentleman entered into a very astute and very earnest argument to show that the price of wheat in the United States was not fixed in Liverpool. Does the gentleman entertain that view as a Republican?

Mr. CANNON. The price of wheat, I am satisfied, is fixed where the major part of the product is sold. [Applause.] Five-sixths of the wheat produced in the United States is sold to our own people in the United States. I will further answer the gentleman's question by asking another: Will the gentleman have the kindness to make things as plain by explaining why wheat of the same quality averages from 12 to 15 cents more in Minneapolis than in Winnipeg?

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him one other question? I recalled, while the gentleman was speaking, that I heard the gentleman from Illinois say that the price of American wheat was fixed in Liverpool. I remembered that because it was my first term in Congress, and I found the RECORD——

Mr. CANNON. On what occasion? What was the bill?

Mr. COOPER. It is page 994 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Fifty-third Congress, second session.

Mr. CANNON. Read.

Mr. COOPER (reading)—

Mr. SIMPSON——

Speaking to Mr. CANNON.

Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. SIMPSON. Does the gentleman not admit that we are now competing in Europe with the different countries of the Old World for the sale of our wheat?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; with Roumania, Russia, and India.

Mr. SIMPSON. Then the gentleman will admit that the price we receive there fixes the price of our article not only in the United States but in the foreign markets?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly; all prices are regulated by the prevailing market, wherever it is.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman then went on to say—I will be candid with the gentleman—that he thought we should protect by a tariff our market here so that we could develop a market and consume all we produce and not have any surplus, but he unequivocally stated, and I have always carried the impression and never heard it doubted, that the surplus in competition with the world fixed the price. If we could get more at home we would not sell the surplus over there.

Mr. CANNON. I fancy that I might, on reading all that was said, possibly have nothing to apologize for in a speech made, I take it, in running debate in 1894. I have no pride in what I have said in former years. Let me say to the gentleman, I can turn to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in the first Congress in which I served, the Forty-third Congress, and I can show him where I, too, believed that commerce knew no boundaries, and that there should be universal free trade. I had not the benefit of a college education. I had practiced law for a living until I came down here at the age of 36. It did not take me long by study and observation to become a Republican in fact as well as in name, and, being converted to the true faith, I suppose I will die in it. I have no pride in what I have said heretofore touching the matter. The gentleman can find in an examination of——

Mr. DALZELL. There is no contradiction.

Mr. CANNON. I do not care to discuss what I said although it seems to me what I said in 1894 does not conflict with what I have said to-day. The gentleman can go back, if he desires and has the interest, and hunt up my record, and he will find that in 1876, in Illinois, we made a contest for the free coinage of silver. There were only two points of difference in value between 16 of silver to 1 of gold, silver then being worth 98 cents an ounce. The issue was not metallic money, but fiat money—"be thou a dollar." I voted to put out great quantities of "sound money." It was not as sound, as subsequently developed, but it had real value, and I recollect putting my contestant out of business when I said to him, "If a fiat of the law can make a dollar, he is an infernally mean man who will not let the Government issue millions of dollars and make us rich, inasmuch as it costs nothing."

Mr. MADDEN. Will my colleague yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] yield to his colleague [Mr. MADDEN]?

Mr. CANNON. I do.

Mr. MADDEN. Just one word.

Mr. CANNON. All right.

Mr. MADDEN. As a matter of fact, what my colleague said in his speech concerning 1894 corroborates exactly what he said to-day, namely, that the price was fixed in the market where the bulk of the product was sold. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. CANNON. I care little about what I said then; I am standing by my vote on this measure. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, on the 26th day of January last the President of the United States sent a special message to Congress embodying such legislation as would ratify and approve of what is known as the Canadian reciprocity measure. That message, Mr. Chairman, fell upon the ears of the Republican standpatters like the alarm of a fire bell at midnight. By their action and by their speeches they have constantly, on all occasions since that, demonstrated that fact. Since that message was sent to Congress it has been very generally discussed in the newspapers and the magazines and by the people throughout the country, and I verily believe that now it is more generally indorsed by the masses of the people than it was when Mr. Taft sent it to the Congress.

It is a question that, in my judgment, Mr. Chairman, far exceeds the personal or the political record of any public man—a wrangle about which we have just heard on the floor of the House. In that I agree with the distinguished ex-Speaker, who has just taken his seat after a long and elaborate argument, the solution and analysis of which is simply an argument that has been made for years past in favor of protection for protection's sake, that this reciprocity measure is of great importance. I confess, Mr. Chairman, that it is a difficult matter for me to believe that any man, whether he opposes or favors this measure, can misrepresent or exaggerate its importance. It is far-reaching in its effects, and the more we study it the more we think about it, the broader and more comprehensive it becomes as to its future beneficial effect, and for that reason, as an earnest Democrat, and believing in the realization in the early future of its mutual benefits to the Governments involved, as well as the present good effect of this reciprocity, I am now and have been a cordial advocate of the measure.

But the question comes now, after this long discussion in the public press and in the magazines, as to what this message means. It plainly draws the lines between the two great political parties of our country. It is a parting of the ways. Republican protection, which means a tariff that prohibits competition on the one hand, and a tariff for revenue, which stands for a reasonable, fair competition, on the other hand. That is really and truly what this reciprocity bill means. All the voluminous talk can not disguise the real issue. I contend without any hesitancy that the standpat Republicans on the other side of this House are right when they assert that it is a menace against the doctrine of protection for protection's sake, the foundation rock on which rests the creed of the Republican Party. I say that not only is it a menace to the doctrine of protection after the manner in which the Republican Party has upheld it, but it imperils the very existence of that party. [Applause.] By no means does this reciprocity measure contain on its face all that will be wrought by it in the future.

What is the proposition? Here we have lying on the north of us Canada with a boundary line of 3,700 miles and more, with not a popgun for defense or aggression to disturb our peace. This is no Mexican boundary to guard or to protect. There it is with more than 72,000 square miles larger than the United States. There it is with 180,000,000 acres of wheat land, 6,000,000 acres of which are now in cultivation, with a people speaking our language, with our habits and customs, living under the same labor conditions that we are, with wages about equal to ours, and who has suffered for years by a tariff wall that this country has constructed and vigilantly guarded along that peaceful boundary line for years past.

That measure which the President has sent in here, Republican President as he is, the Democrats in the last Congress sustained almost unanimously, and a majority of the Republicans voted against it. What else do we find that encourages us to believe that it is right as patriots, from an economic standpoint if nothing else, that we should support this measure?

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who has just taken his seat, said that we have a population of 92,000,000, and that Canada, the one section he did not favor trading with, had about 9,000,000 of people. What is the record of that Caucasian people? Fifty years ago they had a population scarcely exceeding 3,000,000 people. Within the 50 years, while this country has reached a growth of population of 30,000,000 to 35,000,000, Canada increased to only about 9,000,000 of people. What did it? It was because the natural lines of trade and of commerce which gave the least resistance led to the United States, and the tariff wall we constructed was the barricade. [Applause.]

And let us look at it, Mr. Chairman, for a few moments. We can only judge of what this measure means by surrounding circumstances, conditions, and environment. The President in his special message enunciated a far-sighted policy when he called the attention of the Congress to our rapidly increasing population and our decreasing productivity, and especially in food products. Bread is just as necessary to the people as air and water, and the man, or men, who connives at its scarcity and speculates for the sake of money and deprives those who have to have bread commits a dastardly crime. [Applause.] The President in his reciprocity measure with Canada put wheat on the free list. What motive induced him to do that? Our country produces or did produce for many years over 500,000,000 bushels of wheat annually. After using at home all we could consume the remainder was exported. It was evident by the gradual decrease of productivity and export that a change was taking place in our economic position.

In 1909 we exported 114,268,468 bushels of wheat, and in the same year we imported 48,082 bushels, and in 1910 we imported 164,201 bushels, nearly four times as much wheat as we did the year before. Why should we not take steps to meet the inevitable congestion that will overtake us soon if some great change does not take place, by encouraging the development of the fertile wheat lands of Canada and let our people have it free of tariff. Another concurring circumstance that tends to give light as to what this reciprocity measure means and why so many Republicans are against it—a great demand came up from the people in 1906–7 that the tariff duties must be reduced. Many, many were the excuses made by the Republicans why revision should not take place. Becoming alarmed, they at last reluctantly consented to put a paragraph in their platform of 1908 to that effect and went to the country. A special session of the Sixty-first Congress was called to redeem that pledge, and when they went back to the country, on the 8th of November, 1910, the voters told them in plain words how utterly faithless and untrustworthy the Republican Party and its leaders had been in redeeming their tariff pledges by electing an overwhelmingly Democratic Congress, and that is why we are here now, battling for reciprocity. [Applause.]

They undertook to convince the country, by tariff-board propositions and various other political devices, that if they got back into power once more they would certainly correct the mistakes they had made. What was the answer of the people to their suggestion, on the 8th day of November last? It was that they could not be trusted. That was it.

And now let us see. When the worthy and honorable gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS] made his most learned and elaborate speech on last Saturday on this floor the result was simply to uphold the doctrine of "protection for protection's sake." The speech of the gentleman from Maine showed labor and profound study. It was a carefully prepared dissertation. He told us that whenever you open up new areas of land that we must resort to the doctrine of protection to save the lands we have been cultivating. If we follow that up to its legitimate result, but few new countries would be opened up. His speech was a mournful echo of the past. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that whenever you separate, as this reciprocity bill proposes to do, protection for protection's sake from the Republican Party it will languish and die. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is the doctrine that the Republican Party stands for in every essential respect. But, Mr. Chairman, this very doctrine of protection for protection's sake was, by a confession made by the President of the United States, admitted to be wrong, and it ought to be changed. Every standpat speaker has forgotten that. I refer to his celebrated Beverly letter, written at the request of the national congressional Republican committee of August 20, 1910. What was it? I want you to listen to me while I read it. The President was making a promise, hoping to get his party back into line and power. He hoped that the people would listen to him, and he hoped in that way to reform and restore the broken and shattered ranks of his party. Parenthetically, I will say that it seems to me as a political proposition his reciprocity measure has done as much as anything could possibly do to break down the old stand-pat Republican Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It has. What did he say in that Beverly letter? He said:

The truth is—

And emphasis is laid on that expression, "The truth is"—this is President Taft who is talking, talking to get his party restored to confidence, but he did not succeed—

The truth is that under the old protective idea the only purpose was to make the tariff high enough to protect home industry. The excess of tariff over the difference in the cost of production here and abroad was not regarded as objectionable, because it was supposed that competition between those who enjoyed the high protection would keep the price to the consumer down to what was reasonable for the manufacturer. The evil—

Of what?

of excessive tariff—

That his party had been following since it originated—

the evil of excessive tariff rates, however, showed itself in the temptation to manufacturers to combine and suppress competition, and then to maintain the prices so as to take advantage of the excess tariff rate over the difference in the cost of production abroad and here.

That is a clear-cut, plain admission by the leader of the Republican Party, the President of the United States, that the very tariff rates that we are complaining of to-day were "excessive"—an "evil"—that all the great trusts had combined and had squelched out the small industries of the same character and then enjoyed the liberty and the privilege and the power to charge just what they pleased; and they did it with the full knowledge and connivance of the Republican Party, and they oppose this reciprocity because it stops this.

And, Mr. Chairman, the wonderful accumulation of wealth and the wonderful growth of corporations in the last 15 years have come from that excessive tariff and under Republican administration. Do you suppose that honest people, people who have tried them heretofore, are going to trust the Republicans again? Why, no. They are not going to trust them, and the response of the people last November put the responsibility upon the Democratic Party. There are the words of the President himself that the manufacturers took advantage of the consumer; that they combined, and that they abused the excessive tariff by combinations; and that they put up the tariff rates so that no foreign goods could come over here, and thereby built up these colossal fortunes that we are fighting. And yet the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS] in his elaborate speech of several hours says that the great object in successful government is to maintain the "equilibrium" between the factory—a dividend-bearing affair—and the farm, which is a home of areas. That is his doctrine, to maintain the "equilibrium"; to keep up and enrich the manufacturer and impoverish the farmer and make the life of the ultimate consumer one of labor and toil.

Gentlemen, that is the true doctrine of the standpatter. That is what he means, and there has not been a speech made on either side against this measure that has not been in defense of the doctrine of protection for protection's sake. A Republican who faithfully affiliates with his party can not consistently stand for anything but protection. All on a sudden Republicans have become very considerate about the interests of farmers. I am not one of those who so largely believe that this reciprocity measure will at all militate against the interests of the farmers of this country. I remember the great words of Patrick Henry, "By the light of the lamp of experience shall my feet be guided."

If that be true, as uttered by that wonderful Virginian in the early days of the American Revolution, then what have we to go by to lead us to believe that this bill is not unfriendly to farmers? Don't you know that the reciprocal treaty made in 1854 beween this Government and Canada was made by a Democratic Congress? The South at that time, it is true, was quite influential in the conduct of affairs of the Republic. Who repealed that treaty? It was the Republican Party that repealed it. Yet they come here now and complain about the things that Mr Taft includes in his reciprocal pact. What was in that treaty of 1854? Let us look and see. Who repealed it? Undoubtedly history shows, as far as concurrent history can demonstrate anything, that it was the gathering of combined influence of money that got together and repealed that treaty of 1854, the repeal taking place in 1865.

What did Mr. Taft put in the treaty that we are now supporting? It includes cattle, fish, wheat, other grains, fresh vegetables, fruits, and dairy products, and also rough lumber and raw materials useful to our industries. And for the benefit of some of our friends on the other side of the Hall I call attention to the fact that the President, in his reciprocity message of January 26 last, said: "We ought to have free lumber."

What was in the treaty of 1854? It placed upon the free list those articles I have mentioned as being included in Mr. Taft's message, with a good many others. The treaty of 1854 put the following articles and products on the free list:

Grain, flour and breadstuffs, animals of all kinds, meats (fresh and otherwise), cotton, wool, seeds, vegetables, fruits (dried and undried), fish of all kinds, poultry, eggs, hides, furs, crude stone or marble, slate, butter, cheese, tallow, lard, horns, manures, ores of all kinds, coal, pitch, tar, turpentine, ashes, timber and lumber of all kinds, firewood, plants, shrubs, trees, pelts, wool, fish oil, rice, broom corn, bark, gypsum, grindstones, dyestuffs, flax, hemp, tow, unmanufactured tobacco, and rags.

The repeal of this treaty was then considered a public calamity. The repeal of that treaty was most harmful to the rights of American citizens relative to Canadian canals. It broke up the rights of American fishermen, granted under the treaty, to fish in the Atlantic where they pleased, without any regard to limit as to distance. All these and other troublesome and long-pending questions were reopened by the repeal of the treaty and finally settled at The Hague.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with these lights before me can anyone dare say that the treaty of 1854 and the Canadian reciprocity bill now being considered are materially different? It was the protection theory of the Republican Party that repealed the treaty of 1854 and they are struggling now to prevent its revival. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, as I said, I have not the time to discuss this treaty from a political standpoint. I agree with the stand-pat Republicans that, so far as the political standpoint is concerned, if the President was playing only politics and seeking to advance the political welfare of his party, it was a great blunder that he made to send in this reciprocity matter; but he was broader than that. He looked to the welfare of his home country, the economic blessings to us all, to the betterment of Canada. Mr. Chairman, we are in an extra session of Congress and should some one ask me if I thought it a wise political move for a Republican President to call into existence a hostile Congress eight months before due, I would say "No." I was one of those Members who did not want any extra session, and I believe that if we had left it to the Democrats and the Republicans of the House to vote on the question there would have been hardly a baker's dozen in favor of an extra session. But we are here, and the Democratic Members are ready to stay here until we run into the regular December term of Congress if necessary to perform and carry out our program to relieve the people. [Applause.] What have we done? I am more than gratified as a Democrat at the conduct of our leaders and our party here.

In a few days we have passed the bill for the election of United States Senators by the people; we have taken up the campaign publicity bill and put in a provision requiring report of campaign contributions before election as well as after. We have taken up, now, this reciprocity measure, and we will soon have up the "farmers' free list." All of these bills died in the Senate last session. More will be done by a Democratic Congress in this session than has been done in the last 40 years in this House in the same length of time. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We are following the wise policy of "one schedule at a time." We are going to keep up the good work. We were not sent here to act like a "bull in a china shop," to tear everything to pieces. We are exercising and we will continue to exercise conservatism, prudence, and care. Mr. Taft, in his Beverly letter—written, as I said before, at the request of the Republican National Committee—strongly commended acting on one schedule at a time. He certainly can not complain at the course we are pursuing. In due time our people will put up to the President a reasonable, fair reduction on the wool schedule. The country knows that the President said publicly that the woolen schedule was indefensible. I say all we have to do is to keep to the course that we have started, permit no outside influences to guide us, keep up the care, prudence, and freedom from the extreme which has so far characterized our action and has won the commendation of the country and given trouble to political opponents, and just as sure as the election takes place, as it will next year, we will nominate either Harmon, Marshall, CLARK, Wilson, Dix, or some other good Democrat and elect him President of our country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And you will never hear any more complaint about putting these articles on the free list. The people will welcome our conduct. We have suffered long, long years from the onerous imposition of Republican protection for protection's sake. They talk about prosperity. Is it possible that a man can believe that prosperity would come to this country alone through protection? I will tell you what I stand for, and I believe that we should avail ourselves of it, that when we work it out to the full extent we will establish in Canada with this country of ours the same free commercial relations that exist between our States. I believe this country will welcome that hour when it comes. Let them have the same untrammeled free commercial relations that exist between the States, and I believe that this bill leads in that direction. [Applause on the Democratic side.] If Canada can receive the blessings of this reciprocal agreement with a population of not an average of two citizens to the square mile, why can not our country barter and trade in the same way, when it is to our mutual benefit, with France, a country that has 200 people to the square mile, or with Germany, that has 300 people to the square mile? This is not impracticable. That is why in the beginning of my remarks, Mr. Chairman, I said I look upon and welcome this reciprocity measure as a wise menace to protection for protection's sake. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES].

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, the latest declaration of the Texas Democracy upon the question of free raw material is contained in the State platform of August 10, 1910, and is in these words:

> We reaffirm the tariff declarations of the Democratic State and national platforms of 1896, and we expressly condemn the proposition to remove all duties from the manufacturers' raw material so long as such duties remain on the manufacturers' finished product.

This, Mr. Chairman, is the position of the Texas Democracy upon the question of free raw material, and it is this position upon that question which has called down upon the Democracy of our State severe criticism in certain quarters. In my opinion the Democracy of Texas is eminently correct in its position, and I shall briefly address myself to an examination of the criticisms which have been directed against that position.

One of the ablest and most recent assaults upon the position of the Texas Democracy upon the tariff question was set forth in a speech delivered by my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Texas], and because his speech upon the doctrine of free raw material is the fairest and most logical that has attracted my notice, I shall use that speech as the basis of my remarks.

The tariff is a tax. Whatever men may have thought and said about it in the past, we of this day, both Democrat and Republican, concede that it is a tax. All taxes are burdens, and particularly so is a tariff tax, because it is incapable of just and equal distribution. All enlightened men concede that organized government can not exist without imposing the burden of taxation, and all good men are willing to submit to this burden so long as the tax is laid in accordance with the principle of equality. Favoritism and discrimination in tariff taxation as administered by the Republican Party is alone responsible for the disfavor into which the system has fallen in this country, and therein lies the vice of the proposition to exempt the manufacturer from the payment of his taxes when he buys his materials, and which at the same time continues the tax against the people who buy the manufacturer's finished products.

As a means of protecting, fostering, and encouraging the manufacturing industries of this country, I shall concede that free raw material is an effective weapon. Indeed, there is no business in this country, whether it be farming, cattle raising, mining, or manufacturing, which would not be protected, fostered, and encouraged by being exempted from taxation. But the doctrine of Democracy has always been that it was an unjust and oppressive abuse of the taxing power of the Government to tax one man or one avocation in order to protect, foster, or encourage another man or avocation. For almost a hundred years the Democratic Party has warred upon Whig and Republican injustice in administering discriminatory and inequal laws of tariff taxation, so framed as to stimulate a certain class of industry at the expense of the general taxpayers of the country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The fear of injuring the manufacturing industries of this country has always been the excuse of the Republican Party for the imposition of burdensome and excessive import taxes, but it is indeed a strange doctrine to proceed from Democrats who profess to adhere to the Democratic principle of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none."

Those Democrats who propose exempting domestic manufacturing industries from taxation by means of free raw material rest their case upon the following grounds. They say:

First, it is necessary to give the manufacturer free raw material in order to prevent injury, disaster, and handicap to his business. Second, they say, it is necessary to give the manufacturer free raw material to enable him to build up an export trade and to successfully compete in foreign markets with foreign manufacturers. Third, because, they say, it is futile to tax the manufacturer, inasmuch as he adds such tax into the cost of his finished product and it is paid by the consumer.

My colleague [Mr. SMITH of Texas] very ably presents the position of those Democrats who adhere to these views. He assigns the following reason for the first contention:

> My remarks now shall be directed especially to the question as to how the duties must be laid under a revenue-tariff system so as not to handicap or injure any of the industries of the country. I shall undertake to show that this can be done only by placing the raw materials of manufacture on the free list. I shall undertake to show that without the importation of such raw materials free of duty a tariff only for revenue, as contradistinguished from a tariff for protection, is impossible without disaster to many of our industries, from which it will follow that the free raw material is the true Democratic doctrine.

Mr. Chairman, the proposition to exempt the manufacturer from the payment of his taxes by means of free raw material for the purpose of saving his business from handicap, injury, and disaster, is, to my mind, but stating the Republican position negatively. To save from injury is but another name for encouragement; to hold harmless against disaster is but protection negatively announced, and to insure against handicap is at least equivalent to fostering. Neither the Republican doctrine of protection nor this pseudo-Democratic doctrine of saving from injury, is the true principle upon which our tariff laws should be based. The use of the taxing power of the Government for the avowed purpose of protecting, fostering, and encouraging one man's business at the general expense is an iniquitous abuse of power; and it is equally unjust to exempt one man's business from the payment of its just proportion of taxes as a means of saving that business from injury, handicap, and disaster. It is an abuse of power to tax or untax any class of persons or enterprises for the purpose of affirmatively aiding or of negatively preventing injury, where such assistance is given by special privilege at the expense of all other classes of persons and enterprises. The Republican doctrine of taxing all the people for the purpose of encouraging a few, is not improved upon by the proposition to give the manufacturer exemption from taxation by increasing the taxes of everyone else.

The second reason assigned in support of free raw material is that it will enable the manufacturer to build up an export trade. Quoting again from the speech of my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Texas], he says:

> If our manufacturers were not burdened by a tax upon their raw material, they would need no protection, and the duty upon their products could be reduced to a revenue basis. They could go into foreign markets and meet the competition of the world.

The solicitude for the manufacturing industries entertained by those who desire to give them free raw material has already been anticipated by the Republican Party in the drawback provision, so far as articles manufactured for export is concerned. The present tariff law, written by the Republican Party, contains the provision—

> That where imported materials on which duties have been paid are used in the manufacture of articles manufactured or produced in the United States there shall be allowed on the exportation of such articles a drawback equal in amount to the duties paid on the material used, less 1 per cent of such duties.

The effect of this provision is to relieve the domestic manufacturer from the payment of his raw-material tax upon all articles manufactured for the export trade. In the light of the drawback provision above quoted from it is evident that those who now advocate free raw material for domestic manufacturers do so as a means of giving the manufacturers a bounty not enjoyed by other people, and not for the purpose of increasing our exports.

It is very evident to my mind, Mr. Chairman, that when the time arrives that our domestic manufacturers can pay freight and insurance and successfully compete in foreign markets, there will no longer be occasion for the anxiety manifested by protection Republicans or the solicitude exhibited by free-raw-material Democrats for the safety of our manufacturers in our home markets as against the competition of foreign manufacturers with freight charges and insurance against them. I shall not contend, Mr. Chairman, that it would not benefit the manufacturer to exempt him from the payment of his taxes. On the contrary, I know it would aid him greatly. There is no man or business that would not likewise be aided by exemption from taxation. I doubt not that if you exempt the manufacturer from the payment of his taxes it would enable him to wage a more effective war with his competitors abroad in the markets of the world. It would also encourage the farmer, the stockman, and, indeed, all men, to free them from the burden of paying taxes. The farmer, for instance, if relieved of the handicap of taxes, could more successfully invade the foreign markets with the products of the farm.

But the point I wish to emphasize is that it is an abuse of the taxing power of the Government to exempt one class of men or enterprises from those necessary burdens of organized society at the inevitable expense of the balance of the community, even though such favoritism does operate affirmatively to protect, foster, and encourage or negatively to save from injury, handicap, and disaster. Equal and uniform taxation is, and will ever remain, the watchword of true Democracy, and special privilege under this doctrine is equally hateful whether bestowed affirmatively by taxing all men for the benefit of a few or negatively by exempting a few men from taxation at the expense of the many. If the manufacturer demands a free market in which to make his purchases, he ought to be willing to give the people a free market in which to make their purchases. If the exigencies of government are such that both must contribute by tariff taxation to its maintenance, then let us divide and lighten the burden by imposing a part of it upon each. To take all the tax from the backs of the consumer and place it upon the backs of the manufacturer would be no more unfair than the reverse of that proposition, which would result from free raw material. If it is just and wise to relieve the manufacturer from the payment of his indirect taxes, why should not State, county, and municipal governments avail themselves of the wisdom of this theory and exempt manufacturers from all taxes? If exemption from taxation in the one case would afford some degree of insurance against injury, disaster, and handicap, then exemption in all cases would vouchsafe greater assurance against those misfortunes which are likely to overtake any business.

The statement that untaxed raw material would enable our manufacturers to successfully compete with foreign manufacturers in the foreign markets proves entirely too much. It is not so much competition across the ocean that the American people demand as competition at home, in the very markets where they are compelled to buy and sell. But let us suppose that our manufacturers, if given exemption from taxation in the purchase of their materials, would be enabled to carry their goods across the ocean, pay freight charges and insurance, and still sell in the foreign markets cheaper than the foreign manufacturer. What prospect would we then have of obtaining foreign competition? For surely if the foreign manufacturer, with freight charges and insurance in his favor, was undersold in his own market by our manufacturers, he could not pay freight, insurance, and even a moderate revenue duty and bring his goods from the abandoned market at home and hope to compete in this market with the rival who had undersold him at home. So, if this contention were true the effect would be to destroy rather than to encourage a healthy foreign competition.

The third reason assigned by those who would remit the taxes of the manufacturer is that it is futile to collect taxes from the manufacturer, because, they say, he will but add the tax thus paid into the cost of his finished product, and it must be paid by the consumer at last. Quoting from my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Texas] upon this phase of the discussion, he says:

> If a manufacturer should import raw material for his own use, or if he purchases raw material imported by some one else upon which a duty is paid, he adds such duty into the cost of his finished product, and it is paid by the consumer.

If this proves anything, Mr. Chairman, it proves that it is futile to tax any man or business that has the power to add the tax to the cost of the thing sold. Under such a system of emancipation the first great enterprises which would come in for freedom from taxation would be the great railroads and other public-service corporations, in whose behalf the Supreme Court of the United States has already announced the proposition that they can justly and legally add not only taxes, but all other operating expenses, and a reasonable profit as well, to the service sold the public. Under such a monstrous principle of taxation all persons and all property would be exempt from the burdens of supporting the Government save and except the utterly defenseless. The Steel Trust, the Sugar Trust, the Tobacco Trust, the Oil Trust, and, in fact, all trusts would cease to pay taxes, because their ability to add the tax into the prices of the thing they sell is as great, if not greater, than the ordinary domestic manufacturer. Under this specious doctrine of special privilege it would be a waste of time to tax the merchant, because he would add the tax to his selling price. Nor would it avail to tax the professional man, because he would but add the tax to the charge for his services. Through the meshes of this net of favoritism all men would escape except the defenseless multitude who have not the power to pass their burdens along to the shoulders of others. But these defenseless victims of every scheme of privilege and inequality are not always able to pay taxes, and it is doubtful if any scheme of taxation could be devised which would afford sufficient revenue to maintain the Government based upon the principle of taxing only those who were too weak and helpless to pass any part of the burden to the shoulders of others.

It is true, Mr. Chairman, that the manufacturer proposes to recoup himself for import taxes paid when he sells the finished product. He also purposes to add to the price of the finished product all the other elements of cost, such as freight, interest, insurance, and State, county, and municipal taxes. After adding all the elements of cost to the price of his finished product, he then adds, in addition, as much profit as the laws of competition will allow. If a manufacturer suddenly found all his taxes, direct and indirect, and other fixed charges as well, remitted by governments and individuals, he would still exact for the finished product as great a price as his customers would endure. It is true of all men under all circumstances that they seek to obtain the highest possible price for what they sell and to pay the lowest possible price for what they buy. In this regard the manufacturer is not unlike the farmer. If you were to free the farmer from the payment of his taxes, he would still demand the highest possible price for his produce. To expect a different course from merchant, manufacturer, or farmer would be to expect in vain a reversal of the laws of nature and the laws of trade. If an example of this apparent truth were needed, we have a very recent one fresh in the memory of this body. Until the enactment of the Payne tariff bill the manufacturers of boots, shoes, harness, and other leather goods were paying in import taxes to the Federal Government on imported hides about $2,000,000 a year. By the terms of the Payne bill this $2,000,000 was remitted to the manufacturers by placing their raw material on the free list. It is undoubtedly true that the remission of their taxes reduced the cost of production of these manufacturers the $2,000,000 which they had formerly paid to the Government. But it is equally true that their selling price has not been reduced, but, on the contrary, has actually been increased. A tax was retained on the finished product sufficient to keep out the foreign manufacturer, and as a result the purchasers of leather goods not only did not receive any benefit from the remission of the manufacturer's tax on his raw material, but was affirmatively injured, because the resulting loss of revenues to the Government were necessarily made up by increasing his taxes upon other articles. Free raw material means the exemption from taxation of the things the manufacturer buys and an inevitable increase of the taxes paid by the people upon what they buy. If the emancipation of one man from the burdens of taxation could be effected without increasing the burdens of all other men, the operation would still be open to the charge of favoritism and inequality. But what must be said of a proposition to relieve one class of persons of their tax burdens by increasing the burdens of all other men?

If the contenders for free raw material are correct in their position that it is futile to tax the manufacturer because he will in turn demand a return of the tax from his customers, then indeed must our system of taxation be reversed and remodeled. The manufacturer will always purpose to collect the tax he pays from the jobber to whom he sells. The jobber in turn will purpose to collect the tax from the wholesale merchant, and he in turn from the retail merchant and this last from his customers, the ultimate consumer. In this line of dealers, each of whom purposes to add the tax to his selling price, it is as futile to tax the one as the other, for they are each actuated by the common purpose to visit the burden upon the purchaser. The railroad company purposes to add its taxes to freight and passenger tolls, and the telegraph, telephone, and express companies operate upon the same principle. The farmer himself is equally solicitous to add his taxes to the price of the things he sells, and if he fails to do so it is not because he is deterred by altruistic considerations. But the ability of the farmer, merchant, manufacturer, or public-service corporation to add taxes paid to the selling price of his or its goods or services depends upon a variety of circumstances to be considered in any proposition to remit taxes. If the farmer manages well and wisely and is not visited with disaster in the seedtime and harvest he is usually enabled to add his taxes into the selling price of his produce. But his ability to do so not only depends upon his skill and industry, but upon the condition of the markets and the elements of nature as well. The burden is upon him to do all in his power to keep down the cost of production to a point where he can meet competition, and even then he must take his chances with the weather and market conditions. If the farmer neglects to till his fields or is overtaken by storm or drouth he will not be able to add his taxes into the selling price of his produce. And the manufacturer should be willing to meet the same requirements and take his chances upon the same conditions. If the manufacturer wisely and economically conducts his business and is fortunate enough to escape those disasters which so often befall all lines of human endeavor, he will be enabled to secure a return of his taxes in the thing he sells. But he has no assurance of the return. He must keep the cost of production down to a point that will enable him to meet competition if the taxes he paid to the Government is to be returned to him in the price of his finished product. No man purposes to sell without making a profit. Profit must include taxes as well as the other elements of the cost of production, and the ability of the seller to recoup himself should depend in all cases upon his ability to meet competition. Every tax paid by those whose business it is to acquire, produce, or manufacture for sale is treated as an advance and added into the cost of production with the purpose of securing a return from the buyer and a profit as well. The Government is under neither a legal or moral obligation to insure any class of persons or enterprises that taxes paid will be returned to them in the final sale of their goods. That is a risk which all men are justly obligated to assume, and the issue is one of business management and not of governmental favoritism.

POPULATION IS DRIFTING TO THE CITIES.

Mr. Chairman, the whole tendency of our tariff system has been to safeguard and encourage the manufacturing interests at the expense and to the discouragement of agricultural and pastoral pursuits. The result has manifested itself in a hundred harmful ways, but in none more striking than that exhibited by the census returns. Under this system of favoritism to the manufacturing industries and discrimination against the rural population, our cities have become overgrown and congested, while everywhere in the country is presented the spectacle of abandoned farms. Who can blame the farmer or the farmer's son for leaving the farm for the city when he beholds his own avocation discriminated against and neglected by a Government bent upon bestowing all its favors on manufacturing enterprises of the cities. If the farmer is compelled to pay his own tax and that of the manufacturer as well, the tendency naturally will be for him to abandon his own avocation and engage in some other business less burdened. It is unfortunate for the well-being of this Republic that our population is drifting to the cities and manufacturing centers. The agricultural population is by far the safest and most stable constituents of free government. Mr. Chairman, I am utterly opposed to favoritism in government. A just government will confer equal rights upon all and exact equal burdens from all the people. But if this Government is committed to the doctrine of favoritism and can not be dissuaded from that unjust course, then it is high time we select the agricultural class as the objects of our especial care. For a hundred years they have been compelled to bear a double burden under the pretext that it was necessary in order to foster and protect the manufacturing industries. The worst evils to flow from the pernicious doctrine of free raw material would be a further discouragement of pastoral and agricultural pursuits. If the manufacturer is to be relieved of his taxes by this free raw-material device, thus inevitably laying added burdens upon all other classes of taxpayers, the farmers will continue to send their sons to the cities and manufacturing centers. When gentleman talk of imposing taxes for the purpose of encouraging, or remitting taxes for the purpose of saving from handicap the manufacturing industries, they should remember that these artificial helps and aids to one class of people is at the inevitable expense of all the balance of the people. And for every encouragement they afford one man by exempting him from taxation, they do to that extent discourage some other man, whose burdens are increased in the operation.

Mr. Chairman, I have no sort of prejudice against the struggling millions who flock to the cities in an effort to avail themselves of the special privileges bestowed by this Government upon those engaged in manufacturing. I have no criticism to make against country people who flee from the farm to the city. So long as the Government pursues the policy of discouraging the pursuits of the country and encouraging the pursuits of the city we may expect this condition to prevail. What, sir, is the doctrine of free raw material but a command to the farmer and stock raiser to abandon his calling and move to the centers of population? You say by this doctrine that farming and stock raising do not rise to the dignity of domestic industries. If the manufacturer wants to purchase materials for his business you remit his taxes as an encouragement to his industry. But when the farmer wants to purchase materials for his business you demand that he pay a double tax in the purchase. By this selfish contortion of the tariff laws you declare that farming and stock raising are not such industries as are worthy to be encouraged. You go even further in your discrimination, for you demand that the producers of raw material shall pay the manufacturer's tax as well as their own. What has been the fruits of this favoritism to those engaged in manufacturing? The fruits, sir, are the untilled fields and abandoned homes of the country and the congested slums and teeming millions of the city.

Not only is our swelling tide of foreign immigration flocking to the cities as soon as they set foot upon our shores, but the native population are no longer content to remain in the country. The recent report of the Immigration Commission reveals a startling state of affairs in this regard. A census of the pupils in the schools of 37 of our largest cities shows that 58.5 per cent of the total are the children of foreign-born fathers. In the great city of New York 71.4 per cent of the pupils were the children of foreign-born fathers, and in the cities of Chelsea, Mass., and Duluth, Minn., the percentage was 74.1 in each city.

The Secretary of Agriculture in his 1909 report strongly emphasizes the depopulation of the farming districts in the following summary:

With the rapid extension, also, of our industrial life and the opportunities offered in the past in business and in the professions the cities have called upon the country for clear brains and vigorous bodies to such an extent that large areas have become so depopulated of active and vigorous minds and bodies that the stock is insufficient to repeople the country districts. The result has been that some of the most fertile lands in our Eastern States, some of the most fertile lands of the world, have been left in a condition of practical if not actual abandonment, and the price of provisions has increased for the simple reason that there are not enough people to actually work the soils and to raise the crops necessary to feed the nonproducing population of the cities.

In the face of these conditions gentlemen propose a further discouragement of the pursuits of the country by discriminating against the farmer's produce, which they are pleased to arbitrarily classify as raw material.

I do not find fault with those who want to give legitimate encouragement to domestic industries, but I do most seriously object to a classification which excludes the farmer, the stock raiser, the mechanic, and all others except those who give the finishing touches to articles of commerce. The farmer whose products feed the world is as much engaged in domestic industry as the manufacturer who converts the products of the farm into a more refined state. Stock raising is a domestic industry as important as the manufacture of leather. The great trouble with those who demand free raw material for the manufacturer upon the plea that it is necessary in order to save domestic industries from harm is that they omit all agricultural and pastoral pursuits from the list of domestic industries.

THE OLD DEMOCRACY.

Prior to the Civil War the Democratic Party very largely controlled the tariff legislation of this country. Under the administration of a long line of able Democratic Presidents the agricultural and pastoral pursuits were recognized as important avocations. Prior to the Civil War no man ever heard of a Democrat who advocated free raw material for the manufacturer. Of all the ante bellum Presidents James K. Polk was by all odds the best equipped upon this question. He was for many years a Member of the House of Representatives, was chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and Speaker of the House. Polk was the best informed man of his time upon the tariff question. In a work entitled "The Messages and Papers of the Presidents," compiled under the direction of Congress by Hon. James D. Richardson, I find these statements as to President Polk's position in the councils of the Democratic Party:

He was prominently connected with every leading question, and upon all he struck what proved to be the keynote for the action of his party. During the whole period of President Jackson's administration he was one of its leading supporters and at times its chief reliance.

It is a coincidence worthy to be set down that President Polk brought Texas into the Union, and that Texas has furnished to the Union the ablest defender of Polk's views and the views of Democracy upon the tariff question.

In his first annual message to Congress President Polk defined with great care the position of the Democratic Party upon the tariff question. I quote from that message:

In levying a tariff of duties Congress exercises the taxing power, and for purposes of revenue may select the objects of taxation. They may exempt certain articles altogether and permit their importation free of duty. On others they may impose low duties. In these classes should be embraced such articles of necessity as are in general use, and especially such as are consumed by the laborer and the poor as well as by the wealthy citizen. Care should be taken that all the great interests of the country, including manufactures, agriculture, commerce, navigation, and the mechanic arts, should, as far as may be practicable, derive equal advantages from the incidental protection which a just system of revenue duties may afford. Taxation, direct or indirect, is a burden, and it should be so imposed as to operate as equally as may be on all classes in proportion to their ability to bear it. To make the taxing power an actual benefit to one class necessarily increases the burdens of the others beyond their proportion, and would be manifestly unjust. The terms "protection to American industry" are of popular import, but they should apply under a just system to all the various branches of industry in our country. The farmer or planter who toils yearly in his fields is engaged in "domestic industry," and is as much entitled to have his labor protected as the manufacturer, the man of commerce, the navigator, or the mechanic, who are engaged also in "domestic industry" in their different pursuits. The joint labors of all these classes constitute the aggregate of the "domestic industry" of the Nation, and they are equally entitled to the Nation's protection. No one of them can justly claim to be the exclusive recipient of protection, which can only be afforded by increasing burdens on the "domestic industry" of the others.

My colleague [Mr. SMITH of Texas], in his speech above quoted from, employs this language:

So it is always safe to bet that the man who advocates a tax on raw material is in his sympathies at heart a protectionist, and whenever protectionists need his help they usually get it.

By the side of that indictment against those of us who denounce the doctrine of free raw material I place the latest declaration of the Democracy of Texas, in which it is declared that—

We expressly condemn the proposition to remove all duties from the manufacturer's raw material so long as such duties remain on the manufacturer's finished product.

As a further indictment against the Democracy of Texas my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Texas] says:

Mr. Chairman, a tax upon raw material is distinctly and emphatically a Republican doctrine.

If that statement is true, then Texas, the banner Democratic State of this Union, is intensely Republican. If that pronouncement is to be accepted, then this Democratic House finds itself under the leadership of a Republican. The distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and floor leader of the Democrats in this body [Mr. UNDERWOOD] distinctly condemned the doctrine of free raw material so recently as March 25, 1909, when the Payne tariff bill was under discussion. Upon that occasion Mr. UNDERWOOD said:

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us consider the bill before the House. I want to call the attention of the committee to these paragraphs that provide for free raw material. The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. PAYNE] announced in his opening statement that he was a believer in the doctrine of free raw material. Being a protectionist, I believe he can justify his position in favor of free raw material. As far back as three-quarters of a century ago Henry Clay announced that one of the ways in which you could protect the industries of the country was to give them free raw materials. Manifestly so. Protection looks to giving some one something, and it is of no importance to the manufacturer at which end of the line you give him the protection, whether you raise the tariff taxes so high as to prevent competition from abroad and enable him to control the entire market at his own prices or whether, on the other hand, you exempt him from the taxation that is being paid by other people and give into the coffers of his treasury a free gift that other people are required to pay for. But I do say that if the theory of the Democratic Party is a correct one, that we are only entitled to levy taxes for the purposes of raising revenue, then we should distribute taxation as broadly as possible, so that its burdens may be borne equitably and evenly by all. That being the case, I do not see how a Democrat can justify himself in the position that what the manufacturer buys should be free and what the people use should be taxed. When he comes to that proposition he admits that he is giving the manufacturer an exemption from taxation for the purpose of making his business prosperous and refuses to levy tariff taxes for the same purpose. Is not the doctrine of free raw material exactly the same position the Republican protectionist takes when he proposes a high protective tariff to make business prosperous? But although the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] may be consistent in his theory in believing in free raw material as a Republican doctrine, I do not believe he has been consistent in his theory in applying his principles to the bill that is presented to the House.

Mr. Chairman, I have no quarrel to make with such of my Democratic associates as believe in free raw material. If they can reconcile their consciences and constituents in the espousal of this device of protection, I shall patiently abide the day of their enlightenment and regeneration. But I do quarrel with such of them as seek to dress this old Republican fraud up in Democratic garments and parade it before the country as the first-born of Democracy. The doctrine of free raw material is either the legitimate progeny of the Whig-Republican Party or it is a political bastard. It was never conceived in Democratic brains or warmed at Democratic breasts.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK, always safe and true as a leader of the hosts of Democracy, is one of the innumerable and unquestionable authorities for the statement that free raw material is not of Democratic origin. So recently as March 24, 1909, Speaker CLARK delivered a speech upon the floor of this House in which he made that matter clear in these words:

A political remark about free raw material may be apropos. There has been a great hullabaloo in later days about free raw material being the Democratic doctrine. It is not true at all. I will tell you what it was. Henry Clay said, in the greatest speech ever made in America in favor of a high protective-tariff system—and, by the way, if he and Alexander Hamilton could get hold of these schedules of woolen manufactures, or hear of them, they would turn over in their graves and curse the day on which they ever advocated the system. But in the greatest speech ever made in America in favor of a high protective-tariff system Henry Clay put down free raw material as one of the four means of working protection. That statement can not be denied. There is no sort of objection to any man's advocating free raw material if he desires, but he ought to give the correct reason for so doing.

Mr. Chairman, the sooner Democrats cease to talk about free lists and begin a systematic and scientific adjustment of our tariff laws the better it will be for the Democratic Party and the country. Let us equalize the burdens of the tariff and the benefits will equalize themselves. If an equal and uniform tax is impossible, that affords no good reason for abandoning the principle of equality and uniformity in adjusting the tax. We should so levy the tax that it will be as nearly equal and uniform as possible. A light tax upon a large number of articles is less burdensome than a heavy tax upon a few articles. If we will make the entire list of imports tax bearing, a light tax upon each article will suffice for the needs of the Government, but if a portion of the articles imported are given free-list immunity from taxation the tax upon the remaining articles must inevitably be made to yield greater revenue. I would scatter the burdens of the tariff tax over a wide range of articles, and if incidental benefits to any class of persons or avocations result from the imposition of the tax, these benefits would likewise be widely distributed. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY].

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I leave my own seat because from that place it is impossible to be heard. Listening to the arguments that have been made against this reciprocity treaty I have been struck with one fact, and that is the fact that this great and glorious country of ours is the poorest country on earth in the sense that we are absolutely unable to compete on our own ground with the inhabitants of any other quarter of the globe. We can not compete in cattle or sheep with the warm regions of South America; we can not compete in farm products with the colder regions of Canada; we can not compete with the bleak plains of Siberia; we can not compete with the peon labor of Mexico; we can not compete with the pauper labor of Europe, nor can we compete with the high-priced labor of the New World. We can not compete with any people in any country in any product under the sun, and Heaven itself is so cruel that the very minerals in the bowels of the earth and the trees in our forests can not compete in richness or growth with any other land. Under the same reasoning, the same class of gentlemen, if the Constitution in the beginning had not forbidden the levying of any duty between the States, would in each and all of our States have erected tariff walls against each other. In Texas they would contend that Texas could not compete with Kansas in corn and they would contend that Kansas could not compete with Minnesota in wheat. They would contend that Minnesota could not compete with California in lumber or fruit; that Georgia could not compete with Florida in oranges, and so on through the long list. They would have had 46 different systems of protective tariff, erecting a wall around each and every one of our States. They would have had a system of petty, picayune protection that would have enabled the few in each State to be enriched at the expense of the many. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And perhaps in the magnitude of the splendid resources in such a State as Texas the protectionists there would have been pointing to the wonderful progress of Texas and saying that protection for Texas had built up its industries and made for its prosperity.

The truth is that this country is so largely prosperous as it is to-day because it embraces the largest multitude of free-born, industrious citizens, among whom there is absolute free trade that was ever in the history of the world given free commercial intercourse. Our country has greater natural resources and a greater enlightened population than was ever gathered under the folds of any government of the earth before, and it is the free trade between these magnificent peoples that enables them to prosper, as they have prospered in spite of the hampering of your protective tariff. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Those gentlemen who sing the praises of protection do not compare Germany and France with England, where the natural conditions are similar, though one of these countries is under free trade, comparatively, and the others under protection; but they always compare this country, the richest on the earth, inhabited by the most ingenious, industrious, and productive people in the world, with the peoples of the Old World, crowded down by the oppression of the classes for the centuries which have gone by, and tell us that our better condition here is due to protection. They never tell us that Germany is ruled by high protection, and that they term her labor pauper labor. They never tell us that England is almost free trade, and has prospered more than any nation in Europe since she adopted her free-trade policy.

This discussion gives opportunity to measure this Congress, not only as to its grasp and conception of the questions of tariff and protection, but also as to how far it understands, how fully or how slightly it realizes the dawn of the new era in politics and the awakening of the heretofore indifferent masses under which the people are more and more determined to tear down privileges, prevent wrong and oppression, and establish justice. Do Members realize what is in the air? What does this talk about insurgents mean? What does the talk about progressives mean—progressive Republicans, progressive Democrats, set over as a force against standpat or reactionary Republicans and reactionary or standpat Democrats? What does all this volume of protest mean? What mean these sharp-tipped arrows of criticism and revolution flying through the air in every direction, arrows tipped with truth, winged with strength, and sure aimed against the high and mighty? What mean the speeches of statesmen who love their country and humanity more than they do party sign and symbol, or the lure of office? We hear the watchmen with vision and voice to see and tell of the night; we read the newspapers every day, those argus-eyed creatures of modern civilization, who pierce every nook and cranny of hidden things; we scan the pamphlets of the so-called muckraker and the magazine writer, the textbook of the political economist, the stories of the novelist, the sermons of the pulpit, and the essays of the humanitarian; the air is charged. What does it mean? It means that the people are in revolt against privilege, oppression, greed, and corruption. Populism and socialism in this country in the nineties was in great measure a protest against the treason of the great popular leaders, who served their masters, not the people, too well.

A wilder storm than Populism may sweep this land if we of this day do not put a curb on unholy greed and make sure that public servants shall indeed serve the people and not other masters.

But, Mr. Chairman, I diverge too far. A local paper on April 16 had this editorial:

SENATE TO ADOPT OMNIBUS BILL PLAN—FINANCE COMMITTEE WILL CAST ASIDE TARIFF PROGRAM PREPARED BY DEMOCRATIC MAJORITY IN HOUSE AND SO MAKE REVISION IMPROBABLE.

When the House of Representatives has finished its tariff program—has passed Canadian reciprocity, its free-list bill, and several schedule revision bills—the Senate Committee on Finance will throw the whole product to the winds and proceed on entirely new lines.

The Senate program will be based on the omnibus bill plan. That is, instead of bringing out the different House bills as separate measures, the Finance Committee will take up the entire series of them, re-form them into a single general tariff-revision bill, and bring this before the Senate.

In doing this the Finance Committee will produce a situation calculated greatly to weaken the chance for any tariff legislation at all to pass.

STRANGE MIXTURE OF MOTIVES.

A strange mixture of motives will account for the Senate's adoption of this program. The regular Republican Senators, of course, favor the omnibus plan because it gives opportunity for that logrolling which has always been the determining influence in making tariffs. They will be able to trade among different interests and groups and industries; to hold one group in line for high duties which it does not want with the threat that if reduction is made at one point it will have to be carried throughout the list.

* * * * * * *

DEMOCRATIC DIVERGENCE.

Then there are two elements of Democrats—progressive and conservatives—on tariff. Among these the division and the divergence of motives is no less acute than among the different stripes of Republicans. Some of them represent States in which protection sentiment has become a factor too important to be entirely ignored. It is crystallized about particular interests, industries, and localities. It is responsible for the bitter antagonism of powerful lumber interests in Arkansas to removal of the lumber duties. It accounts for the fact that Senator CLARKE of that State has lately been accounted a protection Democrat.

This same influence has long made the Louisiana Senators frank protectionists because of sugar. It is making itself felt powerfully in expressions that come from the live-stock and rice industries of Texas. It has made Florida only second to Louisiana among Southern States as a protectionist Democracy because of the Florida fruit interests. It writes the story of Senator SIMMONS's vote for the lumber duties.

The article goes on—I will not read it further now, but I will simply say that it recalls to my mind the suggestion made by the gentleman from Minnesota the other day, who wanted to inject into this bill an amendment adding our free-list bill to this, saying that if we were sincere we would accept the amendment. Ah, in doing that he is charging insincerity on the part of his President, it seems to me. But I say to him that if the Republican Senate should tack the free-list bill to this measure I would vote, when it came back to the House, to accept it, for it can not affect the treaty. I would trust that the President would not, in the face of public sentiment and of the vote of both the House and the Senate, veto that bill, but to put that measure on this bill in the House means to invite its defeat in the Senate, where surely that would then be its fate. I do not propose for this bill to be logrolled to its death. Put this bill and our free-list bill together and we almost guarantee the defeat of both. Separately, this bill will pass this House, and with the President earnestly urging it, it will surely pass the Senate; and then, if those Republicans who now profess to want our free-list bill and want to tack it to this are honest, we will pass that, too, both here and in the Senate, and if we do, I for one believe the President will sign it. In fact, when this bill has become a law I believe our agricultural Republicans will be forced to vote for our free-list bill.

LOGROLLING HAS BEEN THE POWER BEHIND PROTECTION.

The history of tariff legislation shows, indeed, that it has been a long, fearful game in which every man has played for himself. Those whose interests were best organized always have and always will win in such a game. If no man could win an advantage under it, if every man was equally benefited and equally burdened under it, no man would want it. If one man received a benefit of $10 from it only that he might bear the burden of paying $10 benefit to some other man, neither of them would ask for the law. But equal benefits and equal burdens are not a part of protection.

Perhaps 10 per cent of all our people actually receive a benefit from the tariff. Perhaps 40 per cent of them think they receive such a benefit. Ninety per cent of them in fact bear the burden of the tribute that goes to the favored few. That is why those favored few move heaven and earth, spend money, bribe, and lie in order to retain a protective tariff. I represent that vast 90 per cent that bear all the burden; they are the blacksmith, the carpenter, the doctor, the lawyer, the shopgirl and the house girl, the clerk, the farmer who does not raise sheep or cattle or a special kind of wheat, and the workingman—those who toil with their hands by the day or by the month or by the year. I do not represent the capitalist whose personal and family consumption is but a fraction of his individual income. His interest is on the other side or is so comparatively small that it does not affect him. It may seem useless here to try to make plain what this tariff is—how it works and why it is so ardently defended. It is a tax; but if that were all no fight would be on in Congress over it now, nobody would urge it to be made higher, nobody could resist its reduction. Let me illustrate the tariff: If Washington were a walled town such as existed in ancient days, including within its walls all classes of citizens, say to the number of 50,000, she might include 100 families who were gardeners. Now, these 100 families could not raise on their ground all the potatoes consumed by the 50,000 people, and many bushels would be brought in through the gates of the city and sold at the general market price fixed by the law of supply and demand for the whole country round about. Just at this point there comes on the scene a gardener of great shrewdness and he says to the city council, "Our taxes to support this city government are grievous. We could make these people outside our gates pay these expenses by charging them 25 cents per bushel for every bushel they bring in." And the council, with glad acclaim, hail this proposed arrangement and put it into operation. What is the result? The outsider begins to take his potatoes elsewhere, to Baltimore or to Philadelphia, so the people begin to be short and the grocer here is compelled to go outside the gate and pay the same price for his potatoes that Baltimore does and pay that tax or charge of 25 cents himself in order to bring them in. Then if he pays the outsider 50 cents for them and the gatekeeper 25 cents entrance charge, they have cost him 75 cents per bushel, and he must have a profit when he sells them to all the people of the city who eat them, so the people at last pay that tax. But, we have forgotten that wise, shrewd gardener who is raising potatoes inside. He gets a new idea, and taking counsel with himself, says: "If the people who eat pay 75 cents for the potatoes shipped here they must pay 75 cents for my potatoes, therefore, I will raise my price," and he does that very thing. Still finding that they can not raise enough potatoes to supply the city and that potatoes are still coming through the gates and paying this tax and the people seem to know nothing about it, and, finding further, that the city government are lavish spenders and want more money, and that some of them raise potatoes themselves, he comes before the council again, and tells them the land is much richer outside the city and potatoes grow much better outside, and a thousand other things, wherefore he asks that the tax for entrance be raised to 50 cents per bushel and it is done. Now, the people in the city will pay, not 50 cents, not 75 cents, but $1 per bushel for all the potatoes brought in and for all the potatoes the gardener raises, and, therefore, Mr. Gardener defends and demands that this law be decreed sacred and that nobody touch it, unless it be to amend it by revision upward. This, Mr. Chairman, is "the tariff."

Of course it is readily seen that if there were so many gardeners that they raised more potatoes than could be eaten inside the city and they had to go outside the gates themselves to sell their surplus, they could not have had their prices raised by this charge at the gate unless, knowing about the gate tax, all the gardeners inside the city combined together; and having tried the outside market and found the price there to be 50 cents, they might come back into the city, put all their potatoes together, and make the people pay 50 cents plus the gate tax per bushel for all they consume inside and send all their surplus out and sell that at 50 cents. That, also, is not so bad, and that is what our Steel Trust has done. That is the trust stage of protection, which is growing every year a heavier burden and curse on our people. We growers of wheat, corn, and cotton are very much out in the cold. We never have been and never will be able to form such a trust. I very much fear that if we were situated so we could ride on the backs of our fellow citizens we would be inclined to do just as I have supposed the potato grower to have done in the walled city. On this point the speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] is illuminating. He says that when his mills have cut all the lumber they can sell to home consumers at the price they are able or willing to sell them at, being protected against any outside competition by the tariff wall, then it is right that they begin to sell their surplus at lower prices, not to home people, but to foreign markets, without profit or even at a loss, and keep their home price high enough to make a good profit on their entire output in that way, giving to the outsider the benefit of the great supply and cheap product and making the home consumer bear the double burden. Under this kind of protection the donkey is a fitting party symbol of Democracy, because the mass of the people bear the burden of it. We not only bear the burden of higher prices to us, but the burden of enough higher prices to enable the protected interests to go out into the outside market and by adding to the supply there still further lower the prices to the outsider. Our higher prices here help decrease home consumption and help to make a surplus in the home market, and that surplus is used to help supply the foreign demand and lower the foreign price. What does the lumber-mill man care who pays him the money, so he can cut all his lumber and make the average price a very profitable one? That is what the gentleman from Michigan said the Lumber Trust did; in effect he said they made the home people pay the profit on all the lumber they sold both at home and abroad.

Suppose, Mr. Chairman, it were proposed to make a similar distinction and discrimination as between different classes of our home people. Suppose we should say that when dull times come and a surplus of lumber is on hand the mill man might still keep his prices up as to the countryman, the farmer, but lower it to the city home builder. Would we deem it just? Yet, is it any less just and right to favor some of our home people at the expense of others of our home people than it is to favor foreigners at the expense of all our home people? No, sir; and I tell you we will never get relief from organized greed until we compel the great industries in this country to sell always, whether they are running long or short, at the same price to all buyers, whether for home or foreign trade. Then if Mr. FORDNEY's supply shall be greater than the demand at high prices, let him lower his prices; and if his supply at the lowest price at which he can profitably cut lumber becomes greater than the demand, let him stop cutting. What right, Mr. Chairman, has the lumber king to demand of you and me that we pay him more than we could buy his own lumber for anywhere else than in our own country?

I want to tell you, however, what the largest cattle grower in my county said to me. My county has a little more than 50,000 inhabitants. This gentleman, discussing with me the duty on hides, said that he rendered 600 head of cattle for taxes. He said that if the tax remained on hides and the cattlemen got all the benefit of it, it would probably amount to 50 cents per head, or $300, to him. He also stated there were not over 300 men in the county whose cattle possession would average 20 head. This would make 6,000 cattle belonging to 300 men, and the raised price for their benefit would amount to $3,000. "Now," he said, "if they got the money, who had to pay it?" He thought the tanner could not lose it, so when he bought the hide he would charge it up when he sold the leather to the shoemaker and harness maker, and he would also have to have some profit or go broke—that the harness man and shoe man could not lose it; that they would have to charge it up when they sold it to the man, woman, or boy who wore the shoes or used the harness—and so he said he thought the people who would ultimately pay him the $300 and the 300 small cattlemen their $10 each would be those 50,000 people of my county; and he finished by saying that he had no right to take this money from his people or make them give it to him and that he was not a beggar or object of charity. Mr. Chairman, this plain statement that the ultimate consumer paid the tax, or the increased price by reason of the tax, was the teaching of every Democrat or professed Democrat until two years ago. The Republicans used to claim that the foreigner paid the tax on all imported goods, but even he never claimed that anybody but the ultimate consumer ever paid the increased price paid the home producer by reason of the tax. Even the high-tariff Republican has too much sense and conscience to deny that the original cost of any article must be carried on through its few or many stages of manufacture or transfer and finally unloaded on the ultimate consumer. This has been Democratic teaching for over 40 years, but two years ago a leader of a certain following among Democrats announced a new doctrine, to wit, that somewhere between the producer and the consumer this increase of price to the producer was absorbed and did not affect the price paid by the consumer. This new doctrine is neither Democratic nor true, but it is professed by every so-called Democrat who has some special interest or industry that he wishes to favor or help rob the people.

I want to be perfectly fair, however, to this school of Democracy, and I grant that where the tariff on any finished product is left so high as to exclude all importation, and that product is made and its price fixed by a trust, then placing on the free list the material out of which the finished product is made will not affect the price of the finished product to the consumer, and will add to the profit of the manufacturer, but in that case putting back the tariff on the raw material would increase the profits of the producer of the raw material, but neither hurt nor help the ultimate consumer. The way to benefit the consumer, the ultimate consumer, is not by putting back the tariff on raw material, but by taking the tariff entirely off of the finished product, and let me warn hopeful friends of the ultimate consumer that until we find some efficient means of destroying monopolies and combinations all tariff reduction will largely fail to give the relief we look for, and the greater the number of the people and classes that become interested in profits derived from a tariff on what they produce the harder it will be to prevent these monopolies and combinations and to break the strangle hold of the special interests on the ultimate consumer. I make this statement partly to apply to the colloquy between the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. I am not sure that the price of some special grade of wheat may not be raised by a tariff.

It may be that there is grown in Minnesota a peculiar grade of wheat, all of which is consumed in this country, and for which the demand in this country is even greater than the supply. In my opinion, sir, a tariff tax on the importation of such wheat does have a tendency to raise its price, especially if there is a greater supply than there is demand for the same kind of wheat in Canada, our next-door neighbor, but in my opinion the effect would not be great. As its price increases the people, especially the poorer people, will use less and less of this superior grade and more and more of substitutes for it in poorer grades of flour and corn meal and other substances, while if the supply of this fine wheat increases and the price of it tends to fall, the people will use more and more of this and less and less of substitutes. Whether there be much or little of this superior wheat, it would always be higher than inferior grades of wheat, but not very much higher, because the masses will use common flour or corn meal rather than submit to too great extortion, and we all know that the price of this common wheat both in Canada and America is fixed in Liverpool and must be substantially the same and can not be affected by this treaty agreement, so that the whole effect of this law or agreement, after it has passed and conditions have become settled, its operation become normal and natural, will be so slight as to make the narrowest protectionist wheat grower wonder and ask how it has hurt him or whether it has hurt him at all; but, Mr. Chairman, if it be admitted—and from all the evidence adduced and arguments made here on this floor it is substantially true—that the same class of labor receiving substantially the same wages produce this wheat in Canada that produce it in Minnesota, and I can not see how the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] can contend that the President is wrong when he says that free trade with Canada in wheat does not violate the Republican doctrine of protection, because the Republican doctrine has been proclaimed to be that the tariff should only be high enough to equalize the cost of production in this country and abroad.

I know it is argued that the price should be made higher here than in Canada, because the market price of land in Minnesota is higher than the market price of land in Canada; but it has never been announced, Mr. Chairman, even by the Republicans, that protection ought to be made the means of equalizing the price of land or giving the landowner an equal income on the value of his land, unless the last paragraph of the last Republican platform, which demands that a reasonable income on investments to be insured by the tariff be so construed, and that part of the platform I understand Mr. LENROOT to repudiate. Besides all this, sir, there is just as much difference in the value of lands in the different States of the Union as there is in the value of land between Minnesota and Canada.

The difference between the Canadian yield and the Minnesota yield is not near so great as the difference between the Minnesota yield and the yield in Texas. The difference in the quality of the wheat in Minnesota and Canada is not near so great as the difference in wheat in quality in favor of the Minnesota wheat over the Texas wheat. Greater yields of wheat per acre generally may be made perhaps in the North than in the South, and by the logic of the gentleman from Minnesota, if there is to be any justice in tariff, then we ought to have a tariff between the States, so as to equalize the cost of production and equalize the value of land and the yield per acre in the different States. Again, Mr. Chairman, if those who oppose this treaty on the ground that it may enable somebody to compete with their wheat products and possibly lower their price by adding to the supply of this fine wheat, if they are right, I say, they ought to oppose everything else that would have the same tendency. They ought to oppose every project for irrigating vast arid regions or for draining great swamp regions and thereby adding hundreds of millions of acres to our agricultural lands, because by these means we would increase, and vastly increase, the crops of corn, wheat, and other foodstuffs which help to feed the American people, and by this increase you will help to lessen the demand and price for the gentleman's fine wheat. We have spent millions and are spending millions more to redeem great areas of this arid and swamp land, and yet when a proposition arises under which without the expenditure of a single dollar we may have access for the purpose of raising wheat to millions of acres of land of good quality which has heretofore been cut off from us, the gentleman from Minnesota objects. There is no consistency in spending millions by the Government to irrigate a million acres of land to make it produce wheat for our people's consumption and refusing to accept a million acres of land already fitted for growing wheat when it is offered to us without money and without price.

In the same way there is no excuse for spending millions to reforest land denuded of its trees and refusing to accept all the timber and lumber free of tax that might be shipped into our borders. I want to be fair with these gentlemen. There is no question of any necessity of a tariff on wheat to equalize the labor cost of production; but there is a reason that may become powerful if our city population continues to grow and our rural population ceases to grow, under which the farmer, especially the producer of foodstuffs, may ask for a so-called protective tariff to greatly enhance the price of his products.

If this country ever ceases to produce breadstuffs or foodstuffs of all kinds sufficient for its home consumption and becomes an importer rather than an exporter of foodstuffs, then the farming interests of the United States, without any tariff, will get better prices than they ever have gotten for their products, but if they do like the manufacturing interests have done heretofore, they will combine and demand that a tariff wall be erected and a great tariff tax be imposed for their benefit, and this, even though they may be able to produce at a smaller labor cost than the countries against which they ask protection. They will see an opportunity to levy a tribute for bread upon every man, woman, and child in the United States, and they will find a reason to justify it, unless, before that day comes, we shall have been able to make right and justice and principle stronger than greed in the human heart or, unless before that day comes, we shall have abolished the system of collecting taxes by import duties and cease to hold before all our people a system under which part of the people are interested in making taxes higher and higher, because the higher the tax the greater the tribute collected by them, a system that must have been born in hell, because it tempts all men to gain the whole world at the loss of their souls.

Beyond question, if we did not raise enough wheat of all kinds to supply our people's demand for flour, corn would be resorted to as a substitute, and if we did not raise enough corn and wheat together to supply all our bread, then assuredly a tariff on corn and wheat would greatly raise the price of both—both to the grower and to the consumer. That leads me, Mr. Chairman, to the speech of the gentleman from Maine. He urged us to be guided by Germany and France, which both imposed high duties on farm products, so as to give home producers better prices. It is true that both of these countries do impose a high duty on wheat. Under what pretext I do not know, but surely not on the ground that their poorly-paid labor must be protected against the high-priced labor of America. Doubtless the high protectionist there makes the same patriotic professions he does here, but let us see how it works out. I speak from memory and not precisely. Germany raises only about half the wheat her people consume. Her yield per acre is far greater than our own. Her landowners belong to the higher classes and embrace the lords, who are a great compact political body, well organized, and long trained to uphold their own interests. These landlords combine with the mill owners and other manufacturers to help each other to levy a tribute upon the great masses, and together these German lords, landowners, mill owners, and manufacturers have fixed upon Germany the most iniquitous tariff burdens to be found outside of the United States, and as a result of her system of laws under which the few are favored and the many are burdened, as we were told by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], her working people in the great cities scarcely know the taste of meat. He told us that in the city of Berlin an intelligent foreman of a great factory, talking of the price of living for the employees in that factory, told him that they ate no meat, but lived on potatoes, rice, and the like.

But back to German wheat. Germany has imposed a tariff of 60 cents per hundred on all imported wheat. To do this the landlord helped put on a duty for the benefit of the miller of $1.20 per hundred on flour, to say nothing of the duty he joins in imposing on other manufactures. Then, for the further help of the miller, in order that he might have a monopoly of the grinding for German consumption, and of grinding Germans as well as German flour, they give to the miller a drawback of all the tax he pays on wheat and, I think, even a little more than that on all the flour he makes and exports from imported wheat. This is done, they say, to encourage her mill industry. Under this German law the German miller, like our manufacturer, sells high at home and low abroad. In London German milled flour sells as cheap or cheaper than American flour, but not so in Berlin; that is, the German flour does not sell as cheap in Berlin as the American or German flour sells in London. But this lure of 60 cents duty on wheat has made the German farmer for protection. The miller is for protection because of the $1.20 per hundred duty upon his flour. All the strong organized manufacturing interests are for protection for similar reasons, and none are left to fight for simple equality but the unorganized, the weak, the defenseless. The artisan, the day laborer, the employee, the hireling, the great multitude of the poor, these may sweat and toil and receive the drippings of protection as it trickles down to them through the tight-gripping but overfull hands of the favored classes. These may pick up the crumbs that fall from the rich man's table, but some day their wrongs will cry and cry aloud till Heaven hears them. One thought more. Germany raises half her wheat and imports the other. For her home wheat the price is raised by just about the amount of the tax on wheat imported, and the price of all the flour her people consume is raised by the amount of the tax on flour, or $1.20 per hundred. Therefore, wheat, but not flour, is imported into Germany. Now, if they consume 2,000,000,000 pounds of flour, they pay $24,000,000 more for it than they would without the tax; but Germany only imports one-half her consumption, or, say, 1,000,000,000 pounds of wheat, on which the Government collects six millions of revenue, so by this wheat and flour duty the Government collects six millions of revenue and the people pay just four times that much, or $24,000,000, one-fourth of which goes to the Government, one-fourth to the wheat producer, and two-fourths to the mill owner. This is a fair sample of the workings of protection; but if it shall work in this country till strong men, though laboring hard, may eat no meat and but little bread, a day of reckoning will come when just indignation and hunger will tear down the palaces of greed and oppression. Instead, sir, of insisting on their high privilege of levying tribute on all the people, ought not the gentleman from Minnesota to join us in adopting this bill, which has so many reductions of duties, and then help us to further tear down the throne of this modern Moloch of special privilege? I might be tempted, Mr. Chairman, in some instances to agree with the gentleman that we might favor a protective tariff law whose duties were based on the difference between the cost of production at home and abroad if I did not know that, under the assertion of that principle, under the profession of that faith by the Republican Party for the last 50 years, we have been led first to the Dingley bill and then to the Payne-Aldrich bill. I know, and he knows, that no such protection as he proposes is possible. I know, and he knows, that lemon growers in Florida and California, sugar growers in Louisiana and in the West, woolgrowers in Texas and Ohio will unite with the timber kings on the Pacific and in the South, and the Steel Trust in Pittsburg, and the cattle barons of the West, and the manufacturers of the East, and altogether they will work for and with each other and wring every possible dollar of tribute from the people.

But, Mr. Chairman, the subject I want most of all to discuss in connection with this Canadian reciprocity bill is lumber. I believe that before long every legislator not blinded to the welfare of the people or wedded to the interests will realize that all natural resources which may be exhausted in time, or of which our supply is limited or less than our need, ought to be imported free from any country. They are not the product of man's labor. He can not make them. Nature has planted and matured them—some of them, like the forests, in the passing centuries; others, like iron, coal, crude oil, copper, in the passing of untold ages. If we, as a Nation, might be selfish—not selfish for the few, but selfish for all our people—we might have deemed it wise to impose an export duty on all these and thereby try to reserve them or make them cheaper for our people alone, but we have not done that. By our Constitution we have forbidden that and declared there shall be no export duty—that our riches may go out free into all the world. Nevertheless, the whole country is stirred with the talk of preserving these resources from untoward destruction, and conservation of our natural resources has become a national watchword. If I could to-day double the number of standing trees on every acre of our forest; if I could double the thickness and richness of every vein of coal, copper, and iron; if I could double the output of crude oil, and place all this increase in the ownership of the Government for the benefit of all the people, would I do it? Yes; a thousand times yes; and then I would place a guard with flaming sword over these riches, to see that the Carnegies, the Guggenheims, and the Rockefellers, and the Weyerhaeusers never come near them. If we would preserve all our natural resources—if we would spend, as we do, millions to increase them—why, then, do we put up a barrier to keep out these same riches when from the abundance of other lands they seek our shores? Why, indeed, except to serve the greed of the present holders of these great riches? The lumber story, which is only one of the stories to be told, shall tell you why.

Mr. Chairman, the summary of the report of the Commissioner of Corporations, Herbert Knox Smith, on the lumber industry, part 1, gives a world of information. The author of that report, Mr. Smith, says that his investigations show—

(1) The concentration of a dominating control of our standing timber in a comparatively few enormous holdings, steadily tending toward a central control of the lumber industry.

(2) Vast speculative purchase and holding of timber land far in advance of any use thereof.

(3) An enormous increase in the value of this diminishing natural resource, with great profits to its owners. This value, by the very nature of standing timber, the holder neither created nor substantially enhances.

Another paragraph of his report reads:

From Government to private ownership: Only 40 years ago at least three-fourths of the timber now standing was (it is estimated) publicly owned. Now about four-fifths of it is privately owned. The great bulk of it passed from Government to private hands through (a) enormous railroad, canal, and wagon-road grants by the Federal Government; (b) direct Government sales in unlimited quantities at $1.25 an acre.

Further on I read:

During this interval, and chiefly in the latter half thereof, the value of standing timber has increased tenfold, twentyfold, and even fiftyfold, according to local conditions. The present annual growth is only about one-third of the present annual cut. Replacement by new growth is very slow.

And this further:

Control of the timber controls the whole industry: Whatever power over prices may arise from combinations in manufacture and distribution (as distinguished from timber owning), such power is insignificant and transitory compared to the control of the standing timber itself or a dominating part thereof.

Amount of standing timber: There is now left in continental United States about 2,200,000,000,000 board feet of privately owned standing timber, of which 1,747,000,000,000 is in the "investigation area."

By "investigation area" he explains that he means the area fully covered by his investigation. I read further:

The present commercial value of the privately owned standing timber in the country, not including the value of the land, is estimated (though such an estimate must be very rough) as at least $6,000,000,000. Ultimately the consuming public will have to pay such prices for lumber as will give this timber a far greater value.

Concentration of timber ownership: Three vast holdings alone, the greatest in the country, those of the Southern Pacific Co., the Weyerhaeuser Timber Co., and the Northern Pacific Railway Co. (including their subsidiary companies), together have 238,000,000,000 feet, or nearly 11 per cent of all our privately owned timber. With the five next largest they have over 15 per cent of the total privately owned timber and over 19 per cent of that within the investigation area. Finally, nearly one-half (48 per cent) of the private timber in that area is held by only 195 great holders. The term "holder" covers any single interest—individual, corporate, or group—which is so united as to be under one control.

The Pacific Northwest: Five-elevenths of the country's privately owned standing timber is in the Pacific Northwest (California, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and Montana), 1,013,000,000,000 feet. One-half of this is now owned by 37 holders; many of these are closely connected. The three largest holders (named above) alone have nearly one-quarter. This section now furnishes only one-sixth of the annual cut. Thus its timber is being largely held for the future, and the large owners there will then be the dominating influence in the industry.

The Southern Pacific Co. holding is the greatest in the United States—106,000,000,000 feet. It is difficult to give an adequate idea of its immensity. It stretches practically 680 miles along that railroad between Portland and Sacramento. The fastest train over this distance takes 31 hours. During all that time the traveler thereon is passing through lands a large proportion of which for 30 miles on each side belongs to the railroad, and in almost the entire strip this corporation is the dominating owner of both timber and land.

The second largest holder is the Weyerhaeuser Timber Co. (including its subsidiary companies), with 96,000,000,000 feet. This does not include further very extensive timber interests of the Weyerhaeuser family and close associates.

These two holdings would supply the 46,584 sawmills in the country for four and two-thirds years. They have one-eleventh of our total private timber.

The third largest, the Northern Pacific Railway Co., has 36,000,000,000 feet.

These three holdings have enough standing timber to build an ordinary five or six room frame house for each of the 16,000,000 families in the United States in 1900. If sawed into lumber and placed in cars, their timber would load a train about 100,000 miles long.

The holdings of the two railroad companies are Government grants, and 80 per cent of the Weyerhaeuser Timber Co. holdings was bought from the Northern Pacific grant.

Southern pine region: In the southern pine region there are 634,000,000,000 feet of privately owned timber. Concentration in total timber is much less than in the Pacific Northwest. There is, however, a high concentration in the more valuable species, longleaf yellow pine and cypress. Sixty-seven holders own 39 per cent of the longleaf yellow pine, 29 per cent of the cypress, 19 per cent of the shortleaf and loblolly pine, and 11 per cent of the hardwoods.

The Lake States: In Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Michigan there are 100,000,000,000 feet of privately owned timber. In Wisconsin 96 holders have three-fourths of all the timber. In Michigan 113 holders have 66 per cent. In Minnesota 6 holders have 54 per cent of the very valuable white and Norway pine, 16 per cent of the other conifers, and 2 per cent of the hard woods. Taking all three States, 215 holders have 65 per cent of all the timber.

Is it any wonder that, influenced as we all are by our environments, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] should be so intensely bitter against this reciprocity treaty, when the fact is that lumber alone is the great item that may be affected by this reciprocity? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, let me go on further with this lumber business. Mr. Smith says:

Effect of concentration: Such concentration in standing timber, if permitted to continue and increase, makes probable a final central control of the whole lumber industry. A few strong interests, ultimately holding the bulk of the timber, can set the price of timber and its products. The manager of the National Lumber Manufacturers' Association recently said to lumbermen on the Pacific coast:

"The day of cheap lumber is passing and soon will be gone, but the men who make the money will be those who own timber and can hold it until the supply in other parts of the country is gone. Then they can ask and get their own price."

And I want to say, in connection with that, that in my State the thin remnant of standing timber is fast being cut down and sawed into lumber, and, not content to supply our own State from this fading supply of our timber, they seek for distant markets, and they object to any increase of our supply; and by imposing a tariff attempt to prevent us from obtaining lumber from foreign lands, whereby our present prices of lumber would be cheapened and the timber we have would be further from exhaustion. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I read further:

Certain further factors, not exactly measurable, increase still more the real concentration. First, a further interweaving of interests, corporate and personal, connects a great many holdings which the bureau has treated as separate; second, there are very large totals of timber so scattered in small tracts through larger holdings that they are substantially "blocked in" or "controlled" by the larger holders; third, the concentration is much higher in the more valuable species.

General information obtained indicates a very high concentration in timber ownership outside the investigation area.

Policy of great holders: The largest holders are cutting little of their timber. They thus reserve to themselves those incalculable profits which are still to accrue with the growth of the country, the diminishing of timber supply, and the further concentration and control thereof.

The concentration already existing is sufficiently impressive. Still more impressive are the possibilities for the future. In the last 40 years concentration has so proceeded that 195 holders, many interrelated, now have practically one-half of the privately owned timber in the investigation area (which contains 80 per cent of the whole). This formidable process of concentration in timber and in land certainly involves grave future possibilities of impregnable monopolistic conditions, whose far-reaching consequences to society it is now difficult to anticipate fully or to overestimate.

Mr. Chairman, these statements I have been reading are not wild flights of fancy or the frothings of political oratory. They are sober findings of fact by a painstaking Government official acting under resolutions adopted by Congress asking for investigation into the causes of the high prices of lumber. Now, how any man claiming to represent the people can vote to favor these lumber interests, to deny free admission to lumber, as these lumber kings demand, passes my comprehension. And

If any man should profess to believe that these lumber and timber men are not fighting free lumber by every means in their power, we must either wonder at his stupidity and credulity or at the brazen effrontery of his profession.

I want to read just a little more, and I want now to say that I shall not include in my reading some tables which I will insert with my remarks. I want to refer now to the amount of timber in the different regions.

Total standing timber in the Pacific Northwest.

[In billions of board feet. Thus, 1,512.9=1,512,900,000,000 board feet.]

States.	Total.	Privately owned.	Not privately owned.
			National forests.	All other.[1]
Pacific Northwest	1,512.9	1,013.0	440.8	59.1
California	381.4	248.1	114.4	18.9
Oregon	545.8	398.1	135.8	11.9
Washington	391.0	294.6	81.6	14.8
Idaho	129.1	50.4	71.0	7.7
Montana	65.6	21.8	38.0	5.8

[1] Includes national parks, military reservations, unreserved public lands, Indian reservations, and timber land owned by the States.

In the southern pine region the total of 634,000,000,000 feet of privately owned timber is distributed as follows:

	Billion feet.
Louisiana	119.8
Mississippi	95.3
Arkansas	78.7
Florida	73.9
Texas	66.0
Alabama	56.3
Georgia (part)	46.0
North Carolina (part)	42.9
South Carolina (part)	30.7
Virginia (part)	14.5
Missouri (part)	9.9

In the Lake States the total of 100,000,000,000 feet of privately owned timber is distributed as follows:

	Billion feet.
Michigan	47.6
Wisconsin	29.2
Minnesota	23.2

The lake region is the least important of the three in quantity of timber, but much of its timber is exceedingly valuable.

Concentration in the ownership of standing timber.

SUMMARY OF PRINCIPAL HOLDINGS.

The bureau's investigation has disclosed a remarkable concentration in the ownership of the country's standing timber. A general indication of this great concentration is afforded by the following tables, in which the private timber holdings of the country are arranged by groups of holders according to size of holding in the investigation area.

Group 1 contains the timber holdings of the Southern Pacific Co., the Weyerhaeuser Timber Co., and the Northern Pacific Railway Co. The other groups contain the holdings ranging between the limits shown below:

Group 2: From 13,000,000,000 feet to 25,000,000,000 feet.
Group 3: From 5,000,000,000 feet to 13,000,000,000 feet.
Group 4: From 3,500,000,000 feet to 5,000,000,000 feet.
Group 5: From 2,000,000,000 feet to 3,500,000,000 feet.
Group 6: From 1,000,000,000 feet to 2,000,000,000 feet.
Group 7: From 500,000,000 feet to 1,000,000,000 feet.
Group 8: From 250,000,000 feet to 500,000,000 feet.
Group 9: From 125,000,000 feet to 250,000,000 feet.
Group 10: From 60,000,000 feet to 125,000,000 feet.
Group 11: Less than 60,000,000 feet.

For the entire investigation area the extent of concentration, by these groups, is as follows:

Concentration of timber ownership by groups in entire investigation area.

Group.	Number of holders.	Amount of timber owned, in billions of feet.	Per cent of total.
Total		1,747.0	100.0
Groups 1 to 10	1,802	1,208.8	69.2
Group 1	3	237.5	13.6
Group 2	5	102.0	5.8
Group 3	14	119.5	6.8
Group 4	26	115.3	6.6
Group 5	42	116.2	6.7
Group 6	105	149.2	8.5
Group 7	190	132.4	7.6
Group 8	273	96.4	5.5
Group 9	489	84.8	4.9
Group 10	655	55.5	3.2
Group 11		538.2	30.8

From these tables it will be seen that 3 holdings include no less than 237.5 billion feet, or nearly 11 per cent of the privately owned timber in the entire country, and over 13.5 per cent of the privately owned timber in the investigation area. These 3 holders are the Southern Pacific Co., the Weyerhaeuser Timber Co., and the Northern Pacific Railway Co. Five other holders ranking next in importance own in the investigation area an aggregate of 102 billion feet, or 4.6 per cent of the total privately owned timber of the country and 5.8 per cent of that in the investigation area. Thus the 8 largest holders together own approximately 340 billion feet of timber, or 15.4 per cent of the total privately owned timber of the country and 19.4 per cent of that in the investigation area.

Twenty-two holders own 26.2 per cent of all the timber in the investigation area; 195 holders own 48 per cent. Stated in another way, more than one-eighth of the total timber in the investigation area (this representing 80 per cent of the total privately owned timber of the United States) is owned by only 3 holders; more than one-fourth is owned by only 22 holders. Almost one-half is owned by 195 holders.

The most marked concentration is in the hands of the comparatively few large holders of the upper groups; the lower groups control a much less important percentage. Thus, while the 385 holders in groups 1 to 7, inclusive, control 55.6 per cent of the timber in the investigation area, the 273 holders in group 8 control only 5.5 per cent, the 489 holders in group 9 only 4.9 per cent, and the 655 holders in group 10 only 3.2 per cent.

Furthermore, these 10 groups, 1,802 holdings, embrace nearly 70 per cent of the total timber in the investigation area, while group 11, the remaining holdings, aggregating unnumbered thousands, have in all only 538.2 billion feet, or 30.8 per cent of the total.

This pronounced concentration is discussed in detail later. At the moment it is essential to point out a few general considerations as to the significance of these figures.

There are other matters in this report showing how these large holders have locked in and hold at their mercy smaller holdings, and how at various times under various laws they have been able to exchange their poorly timbered for the choicest timbered lands, how they never sleep, and so forth, but I must desist. I think I have shown enough.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARDY. May I have just a little more time, say, just 10 minutes? How much did I have?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman had one hour. I promised to let the gentleman from Massachusetts in.

Mr. HARDY. I can conclude in five minutes more.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, then I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to say that the great thing involved in this reciprocity treaty is the opportunity to be given to our people to get the benefit of cheaper lumber, one of the common necessities. I may say that there may be differences of opinion as to whether there will be a slight fall or rise in the price of wheat. It may be that if the tariff wall between us and Canada is down, when Canada's crop fails our wheat growers may be benefited, and when our wheat crop fails that our consumers may be benefited by it; but shall we always be held between the upper and the nether millstones of extortionate prices on everything because some one interest may sometime in some slight degree be affected? If we can not start by giving our people free bread, when surely the great bulk of our wheat is priced by our surplus which goes abroad, where can we ever begin to stand for the forgotten man—the man who has nothing but his labor to sell, the man who needs protection? Who among our fathers who framed the Constitution forbidding export duties, willing that our riches might flow into all climes, and trusting that the natural riches of other lands might find welcome here, could have dreamed, when he walked through the primeval forests of oak and pine in this country, as I have done in my boyhood days, gazing under the sheltering boughs of those vast giants with eyes searching the distant gloom through vistas resembling somewhat the pillared aisles of some ancient cathedral—who could have dreamed 30 years ago that the day would ever come when some vast monopolistic aggregation would gather into its control all the wealth and power of these great resources and would say to the people: "We will fix the price of the shelter over your head"? [Applause on the Democratic side.] God planted the trees, and sent the rain and the sunshine that made them grow. The Government gave away vast areas of land covered by the forests in bounties to railroads, and some—a lesser part—it sold at $1.25 per acre, and these sold lands have been taken over, in the main, by the same stupendous combinations. And now these corporations, these magnates, these potentates, whose wealth puts to shame the heritage of emperors and kings, come to us and say: "It is true these lands, this timber, cost us little or nothing, but we ask that the Government put its arms around us and shield us and protect us, and, by a tax upon importation of lumber, make our timberlands worth, not $10, or $25, but $50, $100, or $200 an acre." And all this we are asked in order that we might pour into the laps of those already overwealthy individuals, from the toil and bounty of the poor, untold, unnumbered, and immeasurable millions. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. McCALL. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HUBBARD].

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Chairman, I find myself standing very much alone. I am the twelfth juryman against the eleven obstinate fellows. I believe in this reciprocal agreement. I look for it to add to, not to detract from, the well-being of the United States. I come from a farming community. Our interests are agricultural. During the years that have immediately passed we have felt, in that country, that the tariff tax, as levied, has subserved the interests of a selfish few; that it meant nothing to us, but meant all to those from whom we had to buy.

I came here pledged and bound to a revision of the tariff downward. My party promised a revision of the tariff downward. Our people demanded it. They had no doubt and no question as to the direction in which their demand lay, as to whether it called for a revision upward or a revision downward. We acted upon the tariff. The Payne bill was the result. My people felt that such a result was a mockery and a failure.

We are called here by a Republican President for the purpose of redeeming, so far as we may, something of that failure.

For these many, many years the farmer has been the drawer of the chestnuts. We have been assured of protection to us when protection to us was, in the very nature of things, an impossibility, and in return we were expected to gather in the ring which disposed of the question of tariff duties, take our share of the loot, and keep our mouths shut. There is an open door offering that which we have sought, an effective revision of the tariff. I shall not hesitate to enter upon the path and follow it to the accomplishment of our purpose.

I do not care particularly to discuss the question whether the tariff on Canadian wheat or Canadian barley increases or leaves untouched the price of wheat and barley in the United States. It seems to me that when the surplus of Canada reaches the free paths of the ocean, and when the surplus of America reaches the free paths of the ocean, they stand there upon a level as to price. They pass to a common market and necessarily to a common price.

And as long as a surplus lasts so long of necessity, with exceptions here and there, must that market price be prevailing and controlling in this market as well as the other markets of the world. But what of it? But what if the price is raised here, what if the duty is added to bread? Can any man contend that the farmer is so poor and so hard pressed that this burden must be added to that of poverty? Are we, in the agricultural regions of these United States, in such miserable condition, as to our land and our labor, that we must, like a sick Caesar, cry to the protected interests: "Give me some drink, Titinnius! Give me some drink."

If scarcity oppresses the land, is it to be thought of that we shall drive bread from our doors that some may profit while others starve? [Applause and laughter.]

Why, sir, what is the wonderful history of my country, of my State, if you please, almost the entire development of which I have seen within my brief lifetime? I drove over wild prairie into Iowa. The prairie fires had been raging. The country was a waste of blackness beneath, and as the night came on and the rain fell, looking upon it from the stagecoach, it was the "seat of desolation, void of light." The land was worth from $1.25 to $3 an acre, and $10 was high. But immigration poured in from all the quarters of the world. Scandinavia sent her thousands and tens of thousands to us, and today it is a fenced-in land. There is no wilderness left in it. The land is worth from $100 to $200 an acre, and earns profit upon that price. And beyond us during all this time, the time of our great development, have lain the Dakotas.

I have seen the time when on one side of the Sioux River land would sell for $40 an acre and $50 an acre, while immediately across, in South Dakota, just as excellent land, bearing just as much, would not sell for to exceed $12 to $15 an acre. Dakota was there. Her lands rose in value as our lands filled. Her prices went up. Her lands became peopled. She is becoming a fenced-in land. To our detriment? No; to our blessing and to our benefit. We exchange one with the other, to and fro, across those State boundaries; her prosperity is our prosperity. The value of our lands has advanced in equal step with the development of Dakota.

So with Nebraska lying next to us. Did we lose anything by the prosperity of Nebraska? Where are conditions of farming most profitable, most sure? Where and when have they been best with us? In the pioneer days, on the edge of things, with wilderness beyond, or among peopled and developed States, cities, towns, market places? Why, my friends who have argued this question seem to think that because across the border from North Dakota, for instance, Canada is selling wheat for possibly 10 cents less than on our side of the line that somehow we are prospering, that somehow our wheat is made dearer because Canada's wheat is made cheaper. As if somewhere, somehow, it must not meet our grain in competition. The influence that to-day, more than all others, is contributing to the splendid growth and well-being of Montana, the Dakotas, Minnesota, is the rapid development of the great Northland. There they are no longer confronting an inhospitable waste, but a growing land filling with a friendly and kindred people. It is as sure as the course of nature that prosperity can not advance on one side of the line and not advance on the other, so long as wind blows and water runs.

We have gone through one experience in the restriction of commerce between these kindred lands. We had a heritage of forest sufficient for all time. I shall not rehearse the miserable story of blind destruction. Our supplies are approaching the end. On the Canada side are now almost immeasurable forests We have forbidden our people to get their lumber from across the line. We have concentrated lumbering upon this side, and the result of the concentration is that it has gathered itself into a few powerful hands that hold the price in the market for lumber in their grasp and fix it at their pleasure. Our posterity for many generations will foot the bill for our folly. Do we wish to repeat the same process with food? We have been the most wasteful people that the world has known. Step by step in our 200 years or a little more of history we have moved across the land leaving it a waste behind us.

Here is Washington situated in the midst of a wilderness. The land once covered by fertile plantations is now grown to woods. All New England has been swept over, the fertility of her soil taken from her and carried away. In Illinois and Iowa we no longer hear of the great returns per acre in wheat which once were common. When you sell a bushel of wheat, of necessity you sell some of the soil with it, unlike the cultivation of corn, clover, alfalfa, and the feeding of stock, leaving each acre the richer for use. Taking the United States as a whole, leaving out these momentary and local interests that may be affected for the instant by Canadian competition, can there be question as to the advantage of these United States in having this great body of wheat-bearing lands lying right along our northern border?

Why, they say the Canada lands are cheap. Not for long; not for long. History will rapidly repeat itself. The human tide has flowed irresistibly from shore to shore. It is but a few years when even the waste lands among us will be peopled and cultivated. They must be. Suppose some great convulsion of nature were to happen to-morrow and the fields of Canada should be severed from us, covered and destroyed as to all possibilities of cultivation. According to these people who are pleading against this treaty such a calamity would be the greatest good fortune that could come upon our country and to our people. This would make us prosperous, add millions to our wealth, because Canada could not then sell wheat in competition with us, either at home or abroad. [Applause.]

Our people are pouring into Canada. We could not keep our land-hungry folks out of such lands, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has described, with guns. We can not prevent this movement if we would. And why should we regret or resist? It is but a repetition of the historic flow of population that has developed the continent. Is it not an excellent and desirable thing that we should have friends and kinsfolk dwelling over the border and influencing the policy and commerce of our northern neighbor?

Who deems it a misfortune that Canada is there? Who would replace her fertile fields and busy millions with waste and solitude?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts wish to yield to anyone else?

Mr. McCALL. Not at this time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know how the division of time stands.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has used 10 hours and 45 minutes, including the time allowed to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCALL]. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has used 10 hours and 3 minutes.

Mr. MANN. In reference to the time charged to the gentleman from Alabama, does that include all of the 5 hours allotted to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has used 3 hours and 10 minutes, and the total time, including that, is 10 hours and 45 minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. So there is 42 minutes difference.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to have the time evened up on the two sides to-night before we adjourn.

The CHAIRMAN. There is 43 minutes difference in favor of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. HANNA].

Mr. HANNA. Mr. Chairman, we have before us for consideration a proposed reciprocity treaty with Canada, the same proposition that was up for consideration by this House in February last, during the third session of the Sixty-first Congress. At that time I submitted some remarks against the proposed treaty, and I wish to-day to briefly make some additions thereto.

The speeches that I have so far heard upon the subject here in the Houe have been largely along the lines as to the effect the proposed treaty will have upon the consumers of the country and upon the manufacturing interests. I wish to speak more directly as to the effect I believe it will have upon the farmers, especially the farmers of the Northern States from Maine to Washington.

The State of North Dakota, which I have the honor of representing in part here in Congress, is purely an agricultural State. The 350 miles of its northern boundary is bounded by the southern boundaries of the great Canadian Provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

Within the last three months I have received from farmers and business men of my State signed protests exceeding thirty-five hundred in number, protesting against the ratification of this proposed treaty. The great majority of these protests have been signed by farmers themselves, and I have only had five communications from my State asking or suggesting that I should support this proposed treaty. The farmers in North Dakota know from actual personal knowledge the difference between the prices which they receive for their grain upon the American side and the prices which the Canadian farmers receive upon the Canadian side of the line. I stated last February that at the town of Portal, on December 31, 1910—and that was before there was any talk of Canadian reciprocity—wheat was worth there that day 86 cents a bushel; across the street in North Portal, which is in Canada, wheat that same day was worth 75 cents a bushel. Barley that day at Portal was worth 63 cents, and at North Portal, across the street, it was worth 35 cents. Flax that day was worth in Portal $2.33, and at North Portal, across the street, it was worth $1.89. (These figures were furnished by the American customhouse officer.) The wheat that is raised upon both the Canadian and American sides of the line is exactly the same kind of wheat.

The grades run the same and the freight rates to Minneapolis, Duluth, Fort William, and Winnepeg are the same. The tariff and the tariff alone gives the American farmer the larger price. There is no argument that can be advanced by any man upon the floor of this House that will convince the farmer living in the border States and who knows the difference in the prices of his products upon this side of the line and the prices for products upon the Canadian side of the line that this Canadian reciprocity agreement is a good thing for him.

There has been much said as to the price of wheat in Chicago, Minneapolis, and Winnipeg. The wheat that is marketed in Chicago is not the kind of wheat that is raised in the Canadian Provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta, and Manitoba and the States of North Dakota, South Dakota, Montana, and Minnesota. The quotations on Chicago wheat are entirely for what is known as soft winter wheat. No. 2 red is, I believe, the contract grade. The only States that produce spring wheat, from which the patent flour is made in any quantity, are the spring-wheat States of Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Montana, and the wheat that is produced in the Canadian Provinces of Alberta, Manitoba, and Saskatchewan is the identical same kind of wheat. This spring wheat is a very hard, flinty wheat and makes the very best of flour, and naturally brings a somewhat higher price than the soft winter wheat; and, in fact, quite a large quantity of this spring wheat is used for the purpose of mixing with the winter wheat and thereby raising the quality of the flour made from winter wheat. There is practically no spring wheat exported from this country, but it is almost all used here in the United States. Six years ago the Province of Saskatchewan produced about 5,000,000 bushels of wheat, now they produce over 90,000,000 bushels; the production of oats has increased from 1,500,000 bushels to over 60,000,000 bushels; barley increased from less than 200,000 bushels to nearly 8,000,000 bushels; flax increased from nothing to over 4,000,000 bushels; and the production of wheat, oats, barley, and flax in Manitoba and Alberta is going up by lesps and bounds.

In the summers in the Canadian northwest the days are extremely long, and the same is true to a somewhat less extent in Minnesota and the Dakotas. In the city of Fargo, in which I live, in the summertime a person can see to read out of doors at 9 o'clock in the evening. The daylight and twilight continues even longer as we go farther north. The consequence is that the isothermal line extends a long way to the north and it is possible to mature grain in this northern country in a very short time. Wheat sown in April is harvested early in August; oats sown in May are harvested at the same time; barley sown in May is harvested the last of July; flax sown the 1st of June is harvested the 1st of September. I have traveled extensively over the Canadian northwest and have seen its millions of acres of virgin soil, much of it as yet untouched by the plow of the farmer, and I realize its possibilities. It is capable of producing wheat, oats, flax, and barley in great abundance, and this vast country, as yet in its infancy in the production of grain, will, with the admission of Canadian grains into the United States free of duty, have the effect of lowering the prices that are now received by the American farmer for grain of a similar character all over this country.

The early part of this month there was a State convention held in the city of Grand Forks, N. Dak., for the purpose of protesting against this Canadian reciprocity agreement. Every county throughout the State, some 50 of them, held county conventions and regularly elected delegates to attend this State convention. It was attended by some 1,200 to 1,500 delegates from all parts of the State, men who were representative farmers and business men, to enter their protest against this proposed treaty. They passed the following set of resolutions by a unanimous vote:

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED.

We, the farmers and business men of North Dakota in convention assembled, protest against the ratification by the Congress of the United States of the pending trade agreement with Canada. In view of this attitude the following declarations were unanimously adopted:

1. That it is unfair and unjust to the agricultural interests, offering to them no semblance of reciprocal equivalent in return for what it purposes to give.

2. That it will bring suffering and disaster to a very large number of our producers, with no hope that the price of bread will be lowered to the consumer.

3. That the duty on barley will accrue in benefit solely to the brewer, incurring great loss to the producer.

4. That it places our farmers in the position of competing in our own home markets with an alien people, upon conditions most advantageous to our competitors.

5. That the Canadian producer, with his cheaper land, requires smaller investment, making the per bushel cost of his product much less than ours.

6. That it "blazes the way" for the emigration of thousands of our people and millions of our wealth to a foreign field.

7. That it will reduce farm values, increasing the burden of the debtor, destroy incentive for the greater development of farm production, and lure to alien benefit untold millions of our wealth that should and would accrue to this and future generations if employed in the development of those vast untilled acres that lie between the Mississippi River and the Pacific within our own borders.

8. That it will lower the standard of farm life, reducing it to one of drudgery, lessen the opportunities for the better education of farm children, and drive from instead of encouraging them to remain on the farm.

9. That it will lessen the purchasing power of our own producers, and by so doing the commercial interests will suffer a greater loss than can possibly be overcome by any gain in trade with Canada.

10. That in trading our home markets of over 90,000,000 people (markets that are abundantly supplied by our own producers, markets that have been largely made and earned, and which, by right and heritage, belong to our own producers) for that of 8,000,000 Canadians, with its doubtful increased advantage to the commercial and manufacturing interests, is not only unfair and unjust, but reprehensible.

These resolutions express the sentiments of over 100,000 American farmers living in the State of North Dakota.

Recently I had a letter from Mr. C. B. McMillan, of my State, who lives within 5 miles of the Canadian boundary line. He writes me "that every farmer and every business man on the American side is against the proposed treaty." He states that "every farmer and every business man across the line on the Canadian side are for it." Let me ask, Are we, the Members of Congress of the United States, legislating to help our own people or the people of Canada?

I also have a letter from Mr. Frank H. Dickinson, of Ayr, N. Dak., a man who has lived in my State for 30 years, and who is one of its most prosperous farmers. He has written me within the week that he intends to sell every acre of his North Dakota land. He says that he believes that this treaty will go through; that it will have the effect of lowering the prices of land, and that he had better get out now while he can get out at a fair price; and then he adds further on in his letter, "land is cheap in Canada; I will go up there and invest." Another farmer writes me, and his letter was received yesterday, and says:

The proposed reciprocity treaty is the burning question in North Dakota. I congratulate you and the delegation in Congress from North Dakota for the position you have taken against it. Everyone in the State, Republicans and Democrats, farmers and business men alike, are bitterly opposed to the ratification of the treaty.

I have had hundreds of letters on this subject, and the ones quoted are fair samples of them all. I do not believe that if we go from Maine to California, throughout any of our northern States, we will find one farmer out of a hundred who is in favor of this reciprocity treaty. For 350 miles North Dakota borders upon Canada. Through the northern half of the State the Great Northern Railroad from St. Paul to Seattle crosses the State. Running north in North Dakota from the main line of the railroad to the Canadian line are 12 branch lines of the Great Northern Railroad, and only three of them cross over into Canada at the present time.

The rest of them run up to within a mile, or 4 or 5 miles, of the boundary line and stop. The reason they stop there is because of the tariff wall that now exists between the United States and Canada. Remove that tariff wall and this railroad will immediately push its branches across into Canada and bring down the Canadian wheat, oats, flax, barley, cattle, and everything else in competition with the farmers of this country.

I see many of the Manitoba and some of the Saskatchewan Canadian papers, and they are without exception heartily in favor of this proposed treaty, believing that it will raise the price of their lands by the influx of Americans into their country and by opening up to them the great markets of the United States. My understanding as to the right way to increase the trade of a country by reciprocity is to trade something we have and which the other country does not have for something they have and which we do not have, and I believe that is true reciprocity. For instance: The United States uses a very large amount of coffee. We buy it largely from Brazil, and it is imported to this country entirely free of duty. We could enter into a trade agreement with Brazil, with the understanding that we would continue to allow their coffee to come in free of duty, and they to make concessions to us for things we produce or manufacture and which they do not produce or manufacture. This would be true reciprocity. But, under this proposed treaty, we are entering into an agreement with an agricultural people—for Canada manufactures but little—and we intend to bring the 8,000,000 Canadian people, who are largely interested in agriculture, into direct conflict and competition with our own agricultural people and in the very same line of products.

In the speech which was made last Saturday by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HINDS] he stated the facts clearly and plainly; showed that while the United States at the present time, at least, was importing but little butter from Canada, yet at the same time Canada was exporting millions of pounds of butter to England. Naturally, if the tariff between the United States and Canada is removed, the distance being so much less and the freight rates so much lower, instead of shipping her butter to England she would ship to the United States, and the same analysis would apply to every other agricultural product.

I wish to quote the price of wheat on Thursday, April 13, 1911. No. 1 northern at Winnipeg was 89½ cents; No. 1 northern at Minneapolis was 98⅝ cents. This is exactly the same kind of wheat—hard spring wheat in both cases. Flax at Winnipeg was worth $2.30 and flax in Minneapolis was worth $2.54. Would these figures indicate that the tariff was of no benefit to the farmers of the United States?

Mr. Chairman, I am bitterly opposed to this proposed treaty. I consider it a one-sided treaty, and that Canada has a long way the best of the bargain. If it is ratified, it strikes the farmers of this country a deadly blow. It means that everything the farmer produces is placed on the free list, except wool—and that, I understand, is to go next. Free raw material seems to be the cry, and the farmer, producing nothing, it is said, but raw material, although to him, at least, that which he produces is the finished product, must suffer. For years the American farmer has been led to believe that a protective tariff was best for the development and building up of this country, and I have so believed and have so maintained, and I believe so now, where all interests and all classes are treated alike. The American farmer has been told that when the time came that the American people consumed the products of the farms that then the tariff would be of real and direct help to him. That time has now arrived. At the present time we are not producing any more barley than we consume; we are not raising as much flax as we consume; our wheat exports are dwindling down, and within the next four or five years we will no longer be an exporter of wheat; we are practically using all of the cattle we produce in this country, and the same is true as to butter, eggs, potatoes, and all farm produce; and the day has arrived when the tariff upon farm products is a real benefit to the farmer. But now, when this time has arrived and when the opportunity has come for the farmer to get a fair price for the products and the things he produces, then the tariff, which is to help him, is to be wiped out entirely.

Under this proposed treaty wheat is placed on the free list, but a duty is left on flour; barley is placed on the free list, but a duty is left on barley malt; flax is placed on the free list, but a duty is left on linseed oil; cattle are placed on the free list, but a duty is left on beef. Where is the justice or the equity in a proposition of this kind? Who has put the larger amount of time and labor into any one of these articles—the farmer, who produces the wheat, barley, flax, and cattle, or the miller, the maltster, the crusher of flaxseed, and the packer? And who is most fairly entitled to a reasonable amount of protection? There is but one answer, and that is that right and justice are upon the side of the farmer, and as far as lies within my power I shall do my best to see that he gets a square deal.

The farmer will not stand to have his products placed on the free list and be content that the manufacturer alone shall have protection. The people have complained as to the high cost of living, but the high cost of living has not been caused by reason of the price that the farmers have been receiving for their products. The trouble has been, and is, that the high cost of living has been caused by combinations and monopolies, high freight rates and express rates, which have been and are between the producer and the consumer. This proposed bill will not in anywise affect any trust or combination which exists for the purpose of raising prices, but will really help them by giving them all farm products free of duty. Farmers' organizations have been started. We have the Grange, the Farmers' Alliance, the American Society of Equity, and others, and the time is not distant when the farmers will rise up in their might and will form an organization that will sweep over this country, and they will demand and will get their just rights.

Mr. Chairman, I believe in a fair protective policy—protection that shall apply equally to all sections of the country, to all classes, and to all people. This proposed treaty strikes at the very foundation of the great principle of protection, which has been the solid rock upon which the Republican Party has stood for half a century and upon which it has had the confidence of the American people. Let us stand together now as Republicans, true to our time-honored principles, and vote against this bill; and if it must go through this House, let it go through by Democratic votes and as a Democratic measure, for that is what I believe it to be. [Applause.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, there can be no doubt in the minds of those of us who have read the statements made by representatives of farm organizations before the committees, or who have read the editorials of farm journals, or who have heard the speeches of Members representing agricultural States, as to what the American farmer thinks of this proposed pact with Canada. He is against it, so far and as fast as he is informed of its real provisions, of its total disregard of sound economic principle, of its total disregard of moral standards, and of its utter lack of the spirit of the square deal.

NO BENEFITS FOR THE FARMER.

The representatives of the American farmer have made it clear that so far as benefits to him are concerned in this tariff measure they are Utopian, imaginary, fantastical. They do not exist. But, so far as burdens are concerned, they are only too real and threaten to become heavy and grievous to bear.

THE BARB-WIRE BUBBLE.

When the masters of the National Grange of many Eastern States first sounded a note of warning to the farmers of this country Secretary Wilson was sent East to make a speech so as to allay the farmer's fears. The great benefit to the American farmer that he found in this treaty was free barb wire. The American farmer may be naturally slow, possibly credulous, and yet he is no man's dupe. He proceeds to look into this alleged benefit. What does he find? He finds it ridiculous to suggest that a saving in the small amount of barb wire used to fence a field or two for cattle would be any offset to his losses. Moreover, he finds that Canada does not produce barb wire, and certainly not in such quantities as to affect the American price of barb wire the least fraction of a cent. He finds that Canada has barb wire on the free list and imported last year over 96,000,000 pounds of wire from the United States. This importation has reached as high as 114,000,000 pounds of wire a year. So this benefit of free barb wire turns out to be a bubble that upon examination bursts and vanishes into thin air. But in the mind of the American farmer Secretary Wilson suffered on this same barb wire a severe rent in the trousers of his reputation which it will take him some time to mend.

FREE LUMBER A GOLD BRICK.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NELSON. My time is limited, but I will answer a question.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I wanted to ask the gentleman whether in his investigations the farmer made any discoveries with reference to lumber.

Mr. NELSON. He did. The next alleged benefit that was claimed for the farmer was free lumber. So the farmer set to work to find out what benefit there is in that item. Being somewhat suspicious on account of barbed wire, he expected to find in it knots and slivers for him. And so he did. The lumber he does not use in any quantity—the rough lumber—is on the free list, but the lumber he does use—shingles, boards tongued and grooved—are taxed in this treaty. But suppose that the benefit of the average reduction made in the tariff on lumber that he does use gets by Jim Hill's railway freight charges, through the benevolent associations of retail lumbermen, and reaches his pocketbook in safety, what would be the amount of saving when he comes to build a new house once in 40 or 50 years? Any old farmer can figure out in his head that this saving, if it got to him, would not exceed $10 or $15. So that this benefit from free lumber turns out to amount to 10, 15, or possibly 20 cents a year as an offset to his losses. Now, the farmer may be slow, credulous, and wear long whiskers, but he is no man's fool. He knows when some one is attempting to work off on him gold bricks.

MOONSHINE MARKETS.

Thereupon the farmers were told of the free markets of Canada for small fruits and vegetables. The farmer takes down his geography to look for these markets of Canada to which he may send his small fruits and vegetables and expect a reasonable profit after he has paid the freight. But he does not find them. They are Utopian. They do not exist. As well might these gentlemen go to the icemen of America and point out the profitable markets of Iceland for ice, or go to the coal men and suggest to them the markets of hades for coal. The farmer knows as well as anybody that his home markets are far to be preferred. He can not be fooled into the belief that he can profit by carrying coal to Newcastle. The farmer may be slow and credulous, but he knows as well as anyone else when some one is attempting to hand him a lemon.

FARM LOSSES REAL.

But while his benefits in this pact are imaginary, his losses are real. The representatives of the American farmer made it clear before committees that now when consumption had overtaken production and he stood to gain from the tariff his relief from Canadian competition is to be taken away from him. They also made it clear that his losses would come to him in three forms.

FALLING PRICES.

These representatives called attention to the falling prices in the crops now on hand. Gentlemen for the treaty may shut their eyes and their ears to the abundance of evidence that exists of its probable effect upon prices, but the farmer knows what is taking place to-day. At the very suggestion of the passage of this pact he suffers a severe loss in present prices. He knows what has happened to the wheat, barley, oats, hay, and dairy products. He asks himself, If this is the effect before its passage, what will be the result when this pact shall have become a certainty? Who can estimate the loss in dollars and cents to the American farmer that comes to him in the falling prices of crops now on hand?

DECREASED CROP VALUES.

But a more serious loss will come to him in the decrease of the average value of his crops per acre annually. The representatives of farm organizations, who know farm statistics, who know the cost of production of every crop, who know from bitter experience the effect of an oversupply in the markets, assert with intense conviction that when this Canadian competition shall be a fact, when the Canadian farmer with his special benefits, which, in general terms, they point out as consisting of greater farm areas, cheaper lands, fertile virgin soil, lower taxes, lower-priced farm labor, cheaper manufactured articles plus farm implements, plus the necessities and comforts of life under the favorable trade relations between Canada and England, and generally a much lower standard of living; when the Canadian farmer shall have free access upon equal tariff terms to American markets in competition with the American farmer, who would suffer under these special disadvantages; smaller farms requiring intensified farming, higher priced lands, the investment required having doubled the last 10 years, worn-out soils, either producing smaller yields per acre or requiring more labor and fertilization, and rotation of crops and years of fallowness, higher and growing taxes, higher wages of farm hands that have increased 60 per cent in 10 years, 45 to 60 per cent tax on manufactured articles plus farm implements now protected by high tariff walls, the necessities and comforts of life, here controlled by monopolies which levy tribute at will, and, finally, the cost of production 50 to 100 per cent above 10 years ago and a much higher prevailing standard of living; when this Canadian farmer, numbering millions, shall flood American markets with his products, the effect must be inevitably a decrease in the average value of American farm crops of at least $1.50, probably $2, and possibly $3 per acre annually. Who can estimate in dollars and cents this annual loss in the lessening values of his crops per acre that may come to the American farmer as a result of this Canadian pact?

WISCONSIN HIT HARD.

Such States as Wisconsin, it is asserted, will be hit hard by this treaty. Farmers fear that it will probably ruin the barley market and at times greatly affect prices on potatoes, oats, cattle, sheep, hogs, cheese, and dairy products.

TUMBLING VALUES OF FARM LANDS.

But the most serious loss, they fear, is tumbling values of farm lands. As a basis upon which to ground this point, I will read a few lines of testimony by Prof. Atkeson, of West Virginia, before the Senate Committee on Finance. Prof. Atkeson testified, in part, as follows:

I am a practical farmer and a teacher of agriculture in our agricultural college. I have been dean of the agricultural college for a good many years. A good many years ago, when I was younger than I am now, I was a laborer on a Kanawha Valley farm that I still own and operate. That land was selling in the fifties, when I was a boy, at $100 an acre. Soon after the construction of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad, which reached Charleston from the farms of the West, that land could not be sold for $35 an acre. Lands that had sold 20 or 30 years previously, before the Civil War, at $100 an acre suddenly dropped to about $35 an acre, because all the lands of the West were brought into competition with this Kanawha Valley land in West Virginia.

What I saw as a boy in the Kanawha Valley, in bringing into competition with that fertile valley the fertile fields of the West, this country will see and feel to a greater extent when we open the fertile, cheap lands of Canada to competition with these higher-priced lands of America. That is as certain as that twice 2 make 4. I do not know to what extent, I do not know how much, it will affect the price of wheat, but I feel absolutely certain that the opening of those cheaper lands to competition with ours must affect seriously the agricultural interests of the country.

Now, this dean of the college of agriculture was stating, from an abundance of experience and knowledge, what every man knows who is at all familiar with the history of agriculture in this country.

A WARNING FROM EXPERIENCE.

What he says of West Virginia was equally true of all North Atlantic States. With the development of the West, where lands were cheap and wild and homesteads free, with the building of the transcontinental railroads, which put the products of these western farms into eastern markets in competition with the products of the high-priced lands of the East, what were the consequences? The eastern farmer took the life out of his farm. He wore the soil to the bone, so to speak, in striving to meet that competition. But it would not avail him. The prices of farm values in the East fell, fell, and fell, until they reached the bottom, where they remained stagnant for about 30 years. There they remained until the West had settled up, until the farms of the West were taken up even in the arid and semiarid regions, until the prices of farm lands became so high that population commenced to drift back East and South, buying up these abandoned farms. Of recent years farming in New York, in New England, and in the Virginias has been picking up. There is now a fair living to be made out of these old farms, and with proper fertilization some profit. The equilibrium between East and West has nearly been restored. But when you now tear down, as you propose to do, the tariff wall between the American farmer and the Canadian farmer, what will be the effect? The dean of the agricultural college, out of his experience and knowledge, has stated the farmers' view. The effect of Canadian competition, he asserts, must be that the farm lands East and West will fall in value precisely as formerly the East fell in competition with the West.

A LONG PERIOD OF STAGNATION.

To what extent they will fall no one can foresee. How long this condition will exist no one can know. It is probable that stagnation will exist until Canada, like the West, shall be populated, all agricultural lands developed, the prices of farm lands in Canada equal prices in America, and general conditions in both countries assume a standard of equality. But in the meantime, basing our experience on what happened in this country and what has happened under like conditions in every country in the world, who can estimate the loss in dollars and cents that may come to the American farmers through this unspeakable folly?

FARMERS' SENSE OF RIGHT AND WRONG OUTRAGED.

But the farmer is not opposed to this pact from material motives merely. It is not with him wholly a question of money. His sense of right and wrong has been outraged.

REAL RECIPROCITY HELPFUL.

At first these words, Canadian reciprocity, fell upon his ears with a pleasant sound. Reciprocity was suggestive to him of the golden rule. It was symbolic of all that is fair, equitable, and just in the dealings of the people of one country with the people of another country. He had not forgotten past Republican platforms. He remembers more or less distinctly the speeches of American statesmen, notably McKinley and Blaine, on reciprocity. He had no fear of any harm, for it meant merely reciprocal arrangements between these two countries in tariffs on noncompeting products. He thought of it something like this: Canada will send over to us some things that we need but do not produce, or do not produce in sufficient quantities, and we will send to Canada that which Canadians need and do not produce in sufficient quantities. Thus no industry will be injured in either country and no class discriminated against, but there will be mutual benefit and service to the people of both countries. He never dreamed of a treaty going beyond noncompeting products, because the moment it does so he can see, as anybody can see, that of necessity favoritism comes into play. Some industry and class will be selected for losses, other industries and classes will be selected for increased profits. Thus the very spirit of reciprocity is destroyed. The farmer's dream was over when he found what this pact really contained. He found in it discrimination against him of the rankest sort.

NOT RIGHT BUT MIGHT.

"By what moral or ethical rule of right have they measured out to me my portion of probable losses?" he asks. "By what ethical standard of right have they selected my products for free trade? What right had they to cheapen the labor of my arm and my brain so as to give raw material to the manufacturer, to relieve him of the payment of tariff revenues to Canada, and to help him to enlarge Canadian markets at my expense? By what standard of ethics was the right or wrong in any of these 250 items determined? By what standard of right and wrong were any of these decreases or increases of tariff rates established?"

To these questions there has been given, there can be given, but one reply—the framers of this pact were evidently not at all disturbed over questions of right and wrong. They had the arbitrary power to make what selections they pleased. Nothing in this pact is clearer than that there was no consideration had of questions of right; it was wholly a matter of might.

TRUTH NOT WANTED.

Moral standards of right having been disregarded, what effort was made to avoid error and to ascertain the truth? The farmer is entitled to know the facts.

"What light was had upon the items of this treaty?" he asks his Representative in Congress.

We answer, "None whatever."

"But did you not have a Tariff Board, to which a quarter of a million dollars of appropriations had been made, whose duty it was to supply you with these facts?"

"We had, but the Tariff Board was not consulted in the preparation of this pact. After the treaty had passed the House a Senate resolution by Senator CUMMINS called upon the Tariff Board for facts. Thereupon the board reported, but the facts furnished in no way sustained the President's argument for the treaty. Instead, it strikingly proves the injustice done by it to the farmers of the country."

"Did not some committee investigate the facts with reference to these items?"

"No," we reply. "Members of the Ways and Means Committee repeatedly stated upon the floor of the House that this treaty was prepared by some person in the diplomatic service, no investigation was had by the committee, and no detailed statement of facts furnished as to any item in the treaty. All testimony taken before the committee was given against it, with the single exception of the newspaper representative, who frankly stated that the newspapers wanted this pact, because it would give them free wood pulp and print paper. The newspaper association represented by him, he argued, would thus save $6,000,000 a year in the cost of print paper."

THE INTERESTS FAVORED BY THE PACT.

"What are the favored interests in this treaty?" the farmer wishes to know.

We reply: "The Beef Trust seems a great favorite. Cattle on the hoof are put on the free list, but meats are taxed 1½ cents per pound. The flour combine is another favorite. It gets free wheat, but secures a tax of 50 cents a barrel on flour. Automobiles are given reduced rates into Canada. This looks like a gift to the General Motors Co., the automobile combine. Automobile manufacturers, at any rate, will save about $80,000 a year in Canadian customs duties. Printers' supplies are in the treaty for reduced rates. This seems to be in the interest of the American Type Foundry Co., which is the so-called Printers' Trust. Aluminum is in the treaty for reduced rates. The American Aluminum Co. is a perfect trust. It has a plant in Canada, but has no rival either there or in the United States. Biscuits are in the treaty. This seems for the benefit of the Biscuit Trust. Fruit products are in the treaty for reduced rates into Canada. This may be for the benefit of the Canned Fruit Trust. Bituminous coal is in the treaty for reduced rates into Canada. There can hardly be any doubt as to this being in the interest of the Coal Trust. It will save at least $450,246 a year in customs duties to Canada that will hereafter be remitted. Condensed milk is in the treaty. This seems to be in the interest of the Condensed Milk Trust. Cottonseed oil is in the treaty. Clearly this is for the benefit of the Cottonseed Oil Trust, which is given free Canadian markets. This trust will thus save annually the sum of $179,138 that it paid Canada last year in customs duties. Articles of glass, of leather, and of brass are in the pact for reduced rates into Canada. This is probably in the interest of the Glass Trust, the Smelter Trust, and the Leather Trust. Iron ore is in the treaty for reduced rates. This may be for the benefit of independent steel companies, but more likely it is in the interest of the Steel Trust. Cement is in the treaty for reduced rates into Canada. This is likely to be in the interest of the cement combine. Farm implements are in the treaty for reduced rates into Canada. This seems clearly in the interest of Morgan's International Harvester Co., which gets reduced rates into Canada for farm machinery of all kinds, and saves at least $100,000 a year in Canadian customs duties—thanks to this proposed pact."

FAVORITISM AND POWER.

"But how in the name of common sense," asks the now indignant farmer, "were these items selected anyway?"

We do not know, but we can form an opinion from the facts that have come to our attention. We find, for example, that cream separators are singled out from all the machinery used in butter making and placed upon the free list. The creamery separator companies directly charge in their circular literature that this industry was discriminated against through the influence of a prominent Canadian senator. A member of the Ways and Means Committee stated that he had requested that grindstones be included in the treaty. From such facts it is easy to infer that when these diplomats representing the United States met with the diplomats representing Canada they favored their friends, their home interests, and political ends; they bargained with each other behind closed doors; and after the exercise of diplomatic ingenuity, skill, and political wire-pulling the items, industries, and classes in this treaty were finally agreed upon, some for probable losses and some for probable gains. Certainly the whole transaction smacks of rank favoritism.

THE GENERAL WELFARE DISREGARDED.

"But was there no consideration had," the farmer asks again, "as to the probable effect of this pact upon the well-being of the American people?"

NOT THE WELL-BEING OF THE FARMER.

The reply must be that a study of the pact reveals clearly that no thought was taken whatever of the well-being, the prosperity, and the good will of the American farmer. He gets no benefit out of it whatever, but stands to lose in every possible way.

NOT THE WELL-BEING OF THE CONSUMER.

Nor will the consumer profit by it. Common sense and a careful study of the treaty will convince anyone of the fact, admitted on both sides of this Chamber, that the reduction made in tariff rates on the farmers' food products will not affect the cost of living to the consumer. He will be the most disappointed of mankind, if he expects to buy his bread, milk, meats, and beer any cheaper than he does now.

The 10 or 15 cents lost by the farmer on a bushel of wheat is not likely to get by the railroad companies, but if it should it will be less likely to get by the Flour Combine, but if it should it will not get by the baker. A loaf of bread will not be changed either in price or size. The loss the farmer suffers on his cattle is not like to get by the transportation companies, but if it should it will hardly get by the Beef Trust, but if it does it will not get by the butcher. The price and size of the pound of meat will not be changed a particle for the consumer. The loss to the farmer in the price of barley will not get by the railroad companies, but if it does it will not get by the brewer, and certainly it will not escape the saloon keeper. The price of a glass of beer will not be less for thirsty throats.

That the consumer will gain nothing by the passage of this pact is so certain that no Member of this House has dared to assert that it would cheapen the cost of living. The farmers' losses will be absorbed by the middlemen, who now get 65 cents to his 35 cents out of every dollar the consumer pays for food. The consumer expects bread, but he will get a bone.

THE MANUFACTURING INTERESTS WILL GAIN.

The manufacturing and monopoly interests will gain in three ways: The Beef Trust, the Flour Combine, the Steel Trust, and other interests will get raw material free, or at reduced rates from Canada. These interests are relieved entirely of payment of customs duties to Canada or given greatly reduced rates. In the case of the Coal Trust, this amounts to nearly $500,000 a year, and, moreover, these privileged interests secure Canadian markets for themselves in return for American markets to Canadian farmers.

NOT PRINCIPLE BUT FORCE.

This treaty, therefore, is not based upon any economic principle, nor is it in accord with any ethical rule of right, and is wholly lacking in the spirit of the square deal. It is what law always comes to be when enacted by a combination of special interests—the expression of brute force and of arbitrary power. That and nothing more.

POWER BACK OF PACT.

Will the House pass this pact? Undoubtedly. There is back of it a combination of irresistible power. The President is back of it with all the power of his great office. The Democratic Party, except 12 Representatives from farm districts, is back of this bill solidly, especially from the South, and party leaders frankly and consistently state that they are for it for two purposes: They desire the overthrow of the entire protective system and the defeat of the Republican Party at the polls in the coming Presidential election. The big daily newspapers are back of this treaty, because this pact gives them free wood pulp and print paper. And, finally, there is back of this treaty most of the Representatives in Congress from New York, Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Louis, and all the large cities, whose constituents mistakingly hold the farmers responsible for the high cost of living. Such is the combination of power that is about to run the steam roller over the American farmer.

FARMER RESENTS UNFAIR TREATMENT.

Now, the farmer resents this treatment of him as a class. He has the self-respect of a just and honorable man, and this discrimination touches his pride keenly. His hands may be callous, but his heart is not, nor his head. The American farmer asks only for a square deal. Why should he suffer such unfair discrimination? How has he deserved it? Certainly not from his own political party.

BACKBONE OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY.

The American farmer has been the backbone of the Republican Party all these years. Cities might go Democratic, but when the votes were counted in the rural districts it was found that the farmer had saved the day. He has been the patient pack horse of protection, because he believed what the campaign orators told him repeatedly upon the stump, that he was getting relief from Canadian competition in American markets.

GRUMBLED AT THE ALDRICH BILL.

It is true that he grumbled when the overloaded Aldrich bill was placed upon his broad back, but even then he did not kick over the traces entirely on the protective principle. He still believed that he had his portion of relief from competition with the only country on earth that he had any cause to fear. His surprise may therefore be readily imagined when President Taft, contrary to his pledge in the Republican platform, proposed a pact that removes entirely the farmer's protection from competition with Canada. In his message the President, in effect, asserts that the American farmer has been the pack horse of protection all these years for nothing.

Unfortunately this announcement comes to the American farmer when relief from Canadian competition would be of real benefit to him, because now consumption has overtaken production East and West; it comes to him at a time when the farmer's vote is no longer dominant at the polls, because 55 per cent of the population of this country now live in the large cities of the land; it comes at a time when the abuse, the perversion, the misapplication of a great economic principle has so outraged public sentiment that it calls for a scapegoat. So the farmer is selected as the sacrificial victim to suffer for the wrongs done by those privileged interests, who even in this pact profit by his misfortunes.

THE FARMER WILL DEFEND HIMSELF.

These privileged interests may well beware lest they plague him beyond all patience. Shorn of his once kingly strength, there is yet remaining to the American farmer the strength of Samson, and Samsonlike he may some day pull down the whole tariff temple over the heads of privileged interests. Surely the Republican Party can not support free trade for the farm and protection for the factory. "A house divided against itself can not stand." Hereafter the farmer will demand protection for every industry alike or free trade for all.

LOYAL TO HIS COUNTRY.

The farmer is loyal to his country. He has faith in Government. He believes that law must represent justice to all classes alike. He is therefore keenly hurt at the thought that the farmer class should thus be discriminated against. What justification is there? The farmer is in no trust. His industry is the one in which there is still full and free competition. He does not declare dividends quarterly. His margin of profit is at most 2½ to 3 per cent on his investment. As a rule he gets little more out of his year's labor and the labor of his wife and children than a fair living for himself and family. There has been no rush from the cities to the farms. The farmer can not strike for an eight-hour day. He works eight hours—but, as has been said, eight hours before noon and eight hours after noon. He risks his year's toil on wind and weather, heat and cold, bugs, worms, pestilence, and politics. As he sees it, this pact will but increase the per cent of mortgaged lands and of farm tenants.

THE REAL PRODUCER.

The farmer feels hurt at this proposed injustice, because he knows he is the real producer of wealth in this country. Farm investments represent twice the value of the investment of manufactures. The farmer has produced 75 per cent of the Nation's wealth. He is the producer of necessities of life, and to discourage him is to reduce the purchasing power of 45 per cent of the population. Is not this a government for the greatest good of the greatest number?

ROOSEVELT REVERSED.

The farmer feels hurt at this injustice, because he knows that he is the salt of the land. Upon the farms must be reared the strong men and women, physically, mentally, morally, and spiritually, that shall be the salvation of this Nation in the future. He knows the danger of centralized population in the great cities. He is familiar with the story of ancient Rome. He knows the history of the decay of nations. Why this sudden reversal of a great national policy? What of the Roosevelt Farm Commission and its purpose of making a happy, contented, and prosperous people upon the farms of this country? What of the appropriations of millions yearly to encourage agriculture? Why, now, strike this body blow at the American farmer?

CONCLUSION.

Gentlemen advocating this treaty profess to believe that these fears and forebodings of the representatives of the American farmer will prove unfounded. Fervently we hope and pray that this may be true. But whatever the future may have in store it is certain that the farmer has nothing to gain by this pact and everything to lose. As a trade this treaty is a farce. Canada gives up revenues amounting to $2,500,000; America gives up revenues amounting to $5,000,000. The American farmers are given Canadian markets of only 8,000,000 people, but the Canadian farmers are given the American markets of 92,000,000 of people.

In short, Mr. Chairman, from the farmers' point of view, this pact is not only a bad bargain, but most unfair when tested by every moral standard and utterly lacking in the spirit of the square deal.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, have I 15 or 17 minutes remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 19 minutes remaining.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, being a new Member, I sat in my place during all the sessions of this term and listened closely to the several debates. Due modesty, as expected from a first termer, would probably require me to sit in eloquent silence throughout this discussion, but I represent a district essentially agricultural, in which all the sources of my people's thrift are to be affected by the final disposition of this bill.

I heard the delightful three hours' entertainment furnished by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], and I wish that my constituents could have seen and heard it. Then came the Member from Maine, worthy successor of Thomas B. Reed, the greatest Speaker of the nineteenth century, and James G. Blaine, that unsurpassed statesman of any age. Blaine gave us the name of the proposition here this day discussed, and I believe that if living they would indorse the doctrine so well voiced by Maine's eloquent son. I do not think either would indorse the substance of the proposition before us to-day. As I was taught reciprocity it was to be the sword of commerce, companion to protection, the shield. And while it might be used as a weapon of offense and even conquest, it should never be perverted into the suicidal blade.

That speech of the new Member from Maine and the several other Members leave anything more than a fragmentary discussion unnecessary. The first days' proceedings of this bill will leave little question in the minds of the country why Maine, smaller in size, less fertile in soil, and younger in history, has and does still exert a more powerful influence upon the times, the Nation, and the world than North Carolina.

The proposition before this House is one vouched for by the President of the United States. That is the best thing that can be said of it. That is also, to my mind, the worst thing that can be said of the President. That my attitude may be thoroughly understood, let me say, I regard our President as the best equipped chief magistrate who ever graced the presidential chair. To his great heart, big brain, ripened judgment, and thorough experience as a jurist, diplomat, and executive, my admiration as a man, my allegiance as a citizen, and my zealous support as a partisan have been faithfully accorded. Something more than two years ago we elected him as President, and when we compare him with those who have announced themselves as candidates against him for the election they all suffer by comparison. But this does not carry, express or implied, any right to control in the processes of legislation. In this matter his work was done when this treaty was negotiated, and I assume his interest now to be similar to that of any other public man in the country outside of the Senate and the House. The Members of this House and Senate should determine this legislation and thus exercise our constitutional prerogatives, "wearing our rights as royal robes, our manhood as a crown."

And to those of the majority let me say that if we are independent under the circumstances, it should be easy for you; if we can meet the front of a presidential Cabinet, you ought to be able to brave the wrathful threat of a Kitchin cabinet.

I am willing to bear my full share of public burdens. My people cheerfully bear theirs; but I dislike unwarranted discrimination. Last Friday this House passed a publicity bill. Publicity is all right, but it should apply to all. That bill should be called "An act to subject Republicans to publicity and exempt Democrats." Well, maybe we could bear publicity better than they, but I did not like the discrimination.

Another discrimination. I do not recall the action of any Republican national convention calling for free trade in our real competitive products and retaining a duty on those practically noncompetitive. I know of no caucus of our party, House or Senate, that has said that all the protection the farmers have enjoyed shall be removed, without removing or paving the way for the removal of all other protective duties. This at a time, as was stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PETERS], when consumption is forging fast upon the heels of production; just when the protective tariff, insuring us control of the home market, would make farm life profitable and homes desirable. Now to lose it after the American farmer for a hundred years, the best buyer in the world, has been forced to buy from protected American factories and mines. Again, the gentleman from Massachusetts suggests that we will soon be able, through the adoption of a constitutional amendment, to have an income tax; just when the farmers are becoming able to have reasonable incomes they will tax them. I am in favor of a reasonable income tax, but its coming at this time, when foreign competing articles are not even taxed up to a revenue basis, seems like "crowding the mourners." And recollect that the farmer's wealth is open to the view of his neighbors, the assessor, and the world; and he can not conceal his thrift as can others.

To our Republican friends who favor this proposition and still desire protection on articles in which they are interested, I recall the chivalrous offer of Artemus Ward, who was ready to sacrifice all his wife's relatives to put down the rebellion. History does not recall what the relatives said when the proposition was put to them, and history is yet to be written what the great Northwest, where Republican congressional votes, as the results of last fall's election, are thickest, will do after the final passage of this act, should it receive material Republican assistance. Unfair discrimination may be endured from the majority during the brief biennium of their incumbency, but such a discrimination by Republicans should never be tolerated.

No farmers' organization seems to have been consulted prior to the enactment of this treaty. Its immediate effect is against the farmers. They were entitled to a hearing. Altruistic and neighborly reasons have been suggested for our ratification of this measure, but to the 6,000,000 farmers this is an economic question and not one of altruism or philanthropy. It is suggested that we should give Canada better terms than we would any other Nation. If we desire to protect our own people and do so effectively, we must be more solicitous of our protection against our more immediate industrial and commercial competitor than those at a greater distance, because in the latter case the additional freight charges amount to a degree of protection.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] said that it was unfortunate that some must live close to the Canadian border. That is true, and we can not widen that line in terms of miles, but we can widen it in terms of money. If we can not say that it shall be 500 miles wide, we can say that it shall be 10 to 25 cents per bushel wide.

I desire to consider the leading reason assigned by the friends of the measure. To be perfectly frank with the country, the President, the majority, and this minority should state that the large purpose, both in negotiating the treaty and its passage through the Congress, is to reduce the cost of living; and to be equally frank in adding that the same shall be done at the sole expense of the American farmer. The majority say it will reduce the cost of living. I agree, although others opposing this bill do not do so. The only important question for debate then is, At whose expense? The products of whose toil, foresight, and prudence are affected? The various grains, forage, and meat and dairy products, all of which are produced by the American farmer, and which are practically all of the products of the American farm, are placed on the free list. If they were not to be reduced in price, then the negotiation of the treaty, the action of the last Congress, and the expense of the present extraordinary session would be all in vain, and if they are reduced in price to the purchasers, they must of necessity be reduced in price to the sellers. I know of no power in such a connection that will make the prices paid smaller and the prices received larger. That is a Herculean task fit only for the majority caucus of this House to attempt. This reduction is considerable; it should not be hastily imposed upon the farmers. If the reduction would be inconsiderable, this whole procedure would amount to "much ado about nothing."

The eloquent gentleman from North Carolina insisted that the price of wheat was the same in Canada as in the United States and therefore there would be no change, but the men who know how prices have run along the southern Canadian border and the northern American border and the testimony they give overwhelmingly establish the incorrectness of the general proposition. There is not an owner of a thousand bushels of wheat who would risk its marketing on the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina, but millions will be marketed upon the basis of the proposition of the gentleman from Minnesota. I marketed my wheat last fall right from the machine, and advised my neighbors to do the same. We heard from Vermont a short time after that, and wheat has been coming down ever since, and what has occurred in wheat has been true in other foodstuffs and meats and dairy products. The supreme confidence of the American people in the ability of the present majority to reduce prices seems firmly fixed. The first reduction came with Vermont's defection. This was emphasized when Maine slumped. It was intensified with the landslide of the general election, and when reciprocity was announced the toboggan seems to have been hit so that the prices now, compared with what they were, represent already countless millions of dollars to the farmers of the land. These market movements and political results may or may not be closely related as to cause and effect, but they usually go together. Some of them feel like an eminent financier in 1904, when there was a sharp slump on the stock exchange of a great national system of railroads. He is reported as saying to his son, "Well, Jay, $5,000,000 went to hell in the Wabash and Missouri Pacific to-day." The comforting boy said, "Never mind, father, grandpa will get it." The farmers can not take such a philosophic view of their losses, because they refuse to admit that they have grandfathers occupying coigns of vantage to catch the loss.

No, my Democratic chanticleer, this is not your sunrise. The king of your brief day was up and beaming in your waking eyes before you, golden-throated herald of the morn, even thought to crow. And he will set regardless of your protest. The more or less warranted resentment of the people was against the Republican Party. It was not in your favor except as an incident. The old remember how prices were smashed in the late fifties under the Elgin treaty and a Democratic administration.

The young remember the cheap man's paradise under your last administration. Do you think, for a moment had the majority last fall declared for this you now indorse—that is, throw down our bars to Canada—that you would be in a majority to-day? No. Tammany and Dixie would not have been given an opportunity to combine against the country.

I listened to the admonition of the gentleman from North Carolina not to fool our farmer constituents upon wheat prices. I will not. I could not. I did not. They told me and are telling me now in a storm of protest by letter, card, and petition, demanding that I vote and speak against this bill, and from the farmers of my district I have not heard one favoring note on this proposition, and these people are from a State with the lowest per cent of illiteracy in the Union. My recollection is that it is a little less than 3 per cent, while that of North Carolina is 28.7 per cent, so that they probably do not need his solicitous aid.

I asked one of my Democratic farmer friends if he thought I should, in the interest of my neighbor farmers, vote for the treaty. He said, "Should the chicken vote for the ax?"

Our market for wheat is to a large extent Minneapolis and St. Paul, where our winter wheat, which does not make the whitest of flour, is mingled at a lesser price with the high-priced northern wheat and commands uniformly a larger price in Nebraska than the high-priced wheat does in Canada, equidistant from Minneapolis. Turn in competition the vast amount of Canadian product and it will drive our wheat from the Minneapolis market. We are not permitted under the pure-food law to bleach our wheat, and we must then depend on the local and southern markets or export. Our friends from the South may be getting cheaper food, and we will be selling cheaper wheat. The millers of my district agree that it will very largely reduce the price of our wheat, and the amount of this reduction will not be measured by the recent production of Canada.

One gentleman discussed the advantage to the beef producer on the farm. A few hundred head of cattle which I annually feed, a few more hogs, the few hundred tons of hay I ship, and what wheat I have produced makes this question to me a practical and familiar one. Especially as to beef. Canada can fatten her cattle on grass and hay and prepare them for slaughter just as well as can and do the cattle raisers of Wyoming, Idaho, and Montana, which cattle, well prepared, furnish a strong competition for our corn and alfalfa fed beeves. I am careful not to send to the markets my corn-fed cattle when there are big runs of cattle from the Northwest fed on cheaper land, cheaper grain, and cheaper hay.

And while we speak of cattle, I recall that under the Payne bill they got our hides—now they want to get our carcasses. I hear the threat of free raw wool. Mr. Farmer, prepare for your income tax. I wonder if there is any new hammer-lock, half-Nelson, strangle-hold, or any other political grip held in readiness for the man whose children have left his home and become a majority in the cities. It is the potential production of Canada, to be stimulated into activity by this agreement, that in the years to come will be the serious, grinding competition, lessening the prices of our products, decreasing the values of our land, draining our banks, destroying the thrift of our communities, and inviting the means, enterprises, and the youth of best promise into a country, an empire in extent, which is to be developed by the drainage of American wealth and energy.

This leads me to what I regard the most important objection to this bill; that is, in this day of progress, it is distinctly a step backward. This Government and its people have lived, grown, and prospered because they have always had the courage to say that our home interests shall be protected and exalted, and upon that theory have our business and industries been upbuilt.

The farmers believed that their protection was safe until at least some great political party declared against it. So, last November they slumbered and slept. The Democratic platform of 1908 furnishes no basis for this act. The following is the Democratic declaration made at Denver. This, if you will recall, was the third epistle of William to the faithful. It was not to the Ephesians, as might be inferred from the Scripture lesson of the gentleman from Connecticut. Both the majority party and the Ephesians have gone out of the silver business. The first epistle of the same eminent author said the gold standard had slain ten thousands while the tariff had slain but a thousand. They are getting down to the small bunches now.

First it says: "We favor immediate revision of the tariff by the reduction of import duties." How? First, "articles entering into competition with trust-controlled products should be placed upon the free list." Now, that is as far as the free list goes. Do our Democratic friends say that farm products are controlled by trusts? Are the farmers in the trust? And if they are not, will you punish them because they are not and somebody else is?

Second. "Material reduction should be made in the tariff upon the necessaries of life, especially upon articles competing with such American manufactures as are sold abroad more cheaply than at home." This measure is not under this clause, because it is a removal of the tariff and not a reduction.

Third. "Gradual reduction should be made in such other schedules as may be necessary to restore the tariff to a revenue basis." It can not be under that clause, because having taken off all the duty, you could scarcely tell how many more gradual reductions you should make before you restore it to a revenue basis. Do you not think you should have warned the farmers before you took this oppressive step against them? You will not be heard to say that a Republican President vouched for it. The Constitution fixes the responsibility upon a majority of this House for revenue legislation.

A large portion of this country was and appeared to be rich and fertile. These parts of the United States have been taken up and settled either through purchase or by the bestowal of the Government. As the American people looked for newer lands, the question seemed to present itself to the Government as to whether the enterprising young people should be allowed or encouraged to change their homes to the new lands of Canada, Australia, or elsewhere. It was concluded by the American people without partisan division, but by common consent, that between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans plains that seemed to be arid, mountain slopes that appeared to be rocky, swamps that were rich but undrained, presented an opportunity which by reasonable amount of governmental assistance would add many millions to the arable lands of the United States without either conquest or purchase on the part of the Government. Under the advice of wise administrations and the assistance of generous Congresses, large projects for drainage, irrigation, conservation, and reclamation have been inaugurated and made effective in various parts of this country, and over $60,000,000 have been so spent. Large projects for drainage in the South and for irrigation in the West are under construction now. The great mountain snows that have heretofore melted in the spring and tumbled down the slope, becoming great engines of waste by erosion and otherwise, and then running purposeless to the sea, are now being captured and held in vast reservoirs to furnish water power at proper intervals and in the dry summer seasons to bathe the soil. The result of all these has been that throughout the West and South lands unproductive either through too much water or too little have been made productive. The deserts of the West have become in large sections as fertile as the Valley of the Nile, and the swamps of the South are being made as arable and productive as the rich prairies of the Middle West. Out of these projects more wheat has been raised per acre than anywhere or at any time in the history of this world. Greater fruit crops have been yielded than were yielded in the Promised Land, the final tempting fact which induced the Israelites to enter. Greater forage yield has come. Greater yield has come from these projects than was ever produced anywhere. There arose among the people of the United States, financial, philanthropic, industrial, and educational, a strong cry and a mighty movement, "Back to the soil." Men, considering carefully the social and industrial problems, welcomed this new movement. It also took on the form of redeeming and reclaiming the impoverished farms of the East and the saving and replenishing of the forestry throughout the United States. In fact, it seemed that so far as agriculture was concerned, the exploiting in a speculative way all new land and impoverishing the old had come to an end.

Perhaps the greatest shock to those interested came with the announcement of this treaty, which, by its terms, prejudiced the farming interests in the United States. It invites men of wealth to make their agricultural investment in Canada instead of in America; the young men and women to seek Canadian farm homes rather than western farm homes; to draw the money from the banks in agricultural communities to invest it in Canadian properties, bringing the level of farm prices and farm products down to the Canadian level; and to divert attention and interest from intensive conserving methods of farming and reestablishing the extensive speculative methods of farming in Canada that were in vogue 25 and 30 years ago throughout the West.

The purpose of all these projects was not speculative, but was to disperse the American people throughout its borders, where homes would be built and maintained and the drift from the farm lands of the eastern half of the United States to the cities might be checked. Wise men, looking ahead, saw the ill results of gathering people into the great cities, every one of which has been well said to be a "great evil."

The United States has within its borders 3 cities containing collectively eight and a half million people. It has 8 cities each containing more than a half million. It has 19 cities containing more than a quarter of a million each. It has 50 cities containing more than 100,000 each. It has 108 containing each more than 50,000; totalling nearly 25,000,000. Broad and inviting as are the valleys, fields, prairies, and forests, the current of human life in America is drifting toward the cities. When this country took its first census, only 34 out of every 1,000 people lived in cities or towns. Thirty years later that number increased to 49 out of every thousand; 60 years later it had increased to 125. In 1900 it reach 311, nearly 10 times what it was at the time of the establishment of our Government. Our urban population now is about 500 out of every thousand, or 50 per cent. And this despite the fact that creative genius made the country, clothed it with beauty, and filled it with fatness; while the city was man made to pollute the air, befoul the crystal rivers, deforest the hills, rob and impoverish the soil. Yet paths to the city from every compass point are worn deep by the feet of farmers' boys and girls, leaving staid and comfortable farm life for the doubtful lure of the city's uncertainties. Were this drift new and without historical precedent, no great concern might be excited, but the tidal drift of humanity into the cities from the beginning of recorded history has led to anything but desirable national results.

Carlyle said, "A great city is a great evil," and few will question that statement. True, there is wealth gathered, culture abounds, religion rears her greatest temples, and beauty basks in the light of loveliness. Yet there is more than a counterbalance of shadow. While Dives feasts, Lazarus, surnamed Legion, fasts and starves. While purity exists, vice is nurtured, debauchery stalks, and crime multiplies. There is the air putrid, the pathway foul, heat oppresses in summer, cold pinches in winter, while manhood and womanhood, weakened and emasculated, become ready victims to sinful and insanitary surroundings. The white plague finds in congested tenements its multiplied victims. Many thousands so afflicted children are in New York and other great cities, while ten times as many daily risk infection in their disease-breeding dwellings, named more politely apartment houses. There, too, the white slave dons her garb of degradation in an atmosphere and environment which forge, fit, and fasten the chains of her shortened life and render swift and sudden the loss of her soul. The metropolitan glare lures fatally the rural moths. They see the apparent warmth and splendor of mansion and saloon. They hear the clink of gold and are thrilled with the throb of the multitude. And these young men and women, like the ant and the swallow, gregarious in their instincts, leave the ozone of mountain, the pure air of the fields, and the beauties of the valley to herd with the multitude at a risk incalculable and a price often unspeakable. The American people were just making a good beginning to turn the tide back to the pure air, rich fields, and happy farm homes, and it seemed to have the support of the great thinkers and those in authority.

Theodore Roosevelt has said:

> I warn my country that the great recent progress made in city life is not a full measure of our civilization, for our civilization rests at the bottom on the wholesomeness, attractiveness, and completeness, as well as prosperity, of life in the country. The men and women on the farms stand for what is fundamentally best and most needed in our American life. Upon the development of country life rests ultimately our ability, by methods of farming requiring the highest intelligence, to continue to feed and clothe the hungry nations, to supply the city with fresh blood, clean bodies, and clear brains, that can endure the terrific strain of modern life. We need the development of men in the open country, who will be in future, as in the past, the stay and strength of the Nation in time of war and its building and controlling spirit in time of peace.

President Taft has said:

> If I were advising young men as to their future profession, I would say that there are greater opportunities in agriculture than in any other profession in our country. The farmer's life takes him away from that nervous exhaustion, that gambling propensity, and that bustle and rapidity that hurry men to their graves.

It seems to me a pertinent inquiry under this consideration, Where are these greater opportunities in agriculture? Are they not the lands rapidly being reenriched and reclaimed in our East, rich still and productive in the Middle West, or that part being rendered especially desirable, profitable, and productive in the great West and South in the United States? Or are they on the boundless plains of Canada? Are they among our home people, or are they among strangers? Are they under the American flag or under an alien flag? It seems to me that the choice is easy and nothing should be done to thwart it. We have lands fertile now and which can be made productive to accommodate and provide for the people of a mighty race for a thousand years to come. If American capital, American brains, American industry, and American youth and blood are to develop any lands, it should be our own. We own the pole at the north; we own the canal at the south. We own all that we want between, where there is ample opportunity for American industry and thrift, and ample room for free, healthful, patriotic homes under the American flag. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to no one in my desire for the fullest and fairest trade relations between the United States and Canada.

I honestly differ with anyone who is of the opinion that this agreement in its present form is fair, just, and equitable.

In clear and unmistakable terms it discriminates against the farmer and for which I feel there is no just cause.

I am unable to understand why in the making of a treaty of this nature it was necessary to place alone the products of the farm on the free list, while at the same time practically everything the farmer purchases remains upon the protected list, ranging from 45 to 60 per cent.

It would be interesting to know—

First. Who it was, acting for the United States, made this treaty with Canada; how much time was spent in the preparation of the same; and what information was furnished, and if this is available. And I hope during this debate some one will discuss the legal features of the same. As I understand it, all revenue legislation is supposed to originate in the House of Representatives.

Second. What data, if any, has the Tariff Board given the Committee on Ways and Means concerning this agreement, and where can the same be procured?

We are paying each of five members of a Tariff Board $7,500 a year, whose business it is, among other things, to secure the best available information upon matters like the pending treaty and give the same to the President and Congress, and recently $250,000 was appropriated that the Tariff Board might have the fullest opportunity to make investigations and report. It does seem to me that if the Tariff Board has not been consulted, or has not had time to consider this measure, undue haste has been exercised.

If the Tariff Board is to be ignored in this, then it will afford an excuse for so doing in all future tariff legislation, and we might as well abolish the board and save the expense.

It is true that the Tariff Board has made a report (see S. Doc. No. 849, 61st Cong., 3d sess.), but in their letter of February 28, this year, addressed to the President, it seems to me that they have made it clear that they have not had sufficient time to properly investigate the matter set forth in the report; and, as much as I admire the President, I am sorry he has called Congress in extra session at this time, for it does seem to me that neither the Tariff Board, Members of Congress, nor our constituents have had sufficient time and opportunity to investigate so important a matter as this treaty; and, for one, I would have been very glad to have had an opportunity between the adjournment of the last Congress and the next regular session of this Congress to have mingled with my constituents, believing that frequent conferences and discussion respecting this treaty would have been of mutual advantage and perhaps would have avoided a good deal of unpleasant feeling that exists in the country to-day, growing out, in part, of the feeling that too much haste has been exercised in forcing this treaty upon the people of this country.

I have the honor of representing a district stretching from the Detroit River (just across from Windsor, in Canada) beyond the State capital and more than 40 miles wide.

Four wards in the city of Detroit—the twelfth, fourteenth, sixteenth, and eighteenth; six townships, bordering in part upon these wards; my home city—Pontiac—of 15,000 people; the cities of Flint and Lansing, with populations in round numbers of 40,000 each—all three splendid manufacturing cities; 75 villages, ranging in population from 50 to 3,000 or more; and the four fine agricultural counties of Oakland, Genesee, Ingham, and Livingston constitute the sixth congressional district of Michigan.

Located as these wards are, just across the river from Canada, composed of thousands of laboring men, manufacturers, merchants, doctors, lawyers, and ministers, I have not received a dozen letters from the people residing in these four wards asking me to support this treaty, and from the 75 villages and three cities mentioned I have not had 50 letters asking me to vote for it, but from the farmers and laboring men on the farm, receiving such splendid wages as they do and who seem to appreciate the same, I have received hundreds of letters and petitions from thousands, not simply asking but pleading that I work and vote against this measure.

Now, why have I not had more requests from the wards to vote and work for this bill? Because many of their citizens lived during the last Democratic administration and have heard it said many times that the last Cleveland administration was more costly than the Civil War, and they contributed their share. Many men and women living in those wards came from the adjoining country districts and they know from bitter experience how, under the last Cleveland administration the farmer was deprived of his Detroit market, the nearest and best one which he had—deprived of it because, under the Wilson-Gorman bill, go as early as he might in the morning with the products of the farm, he would invariably find the Canadian farmer there, ready and willing to part with his products at a cheaper price.

I have, however, received possibly 30 letters from citizens and friends whose opinions I respect, in the other wards of Detroit, urging me to support the treaty, and in each and every case I replied frankly, stating my position, that I did not regard the agreement as fair, and in nearly every case where I received replies they were equally as frank in admitting my contention, but urging that we must be broad, generous, and magnanimous; others that it was only an entering wedge; and from others that it was but the beginning. I am unable to understand why we should begin by taking the whole pound of flesh from the farmer.

The farmers residing in my district are greatly dissatisfied with the terms of this treaty, and have expressed themselves in no uncertain terms. To give you an idea of the sentiment among the farmers, I will say that it has been no uncommon thing for a canvass to be made of a rural route, and some of the results are as follows: One for the treaty; 32 against; 5 for the treaty; 49 against; 3 for the treaty; 62 against.

At the recent spring election, April 3, in the township of Novi, Oakland County, 250 votes, in round numbers, were polled, as I am informed, and I have received a petition from more than 200 of that number who are opposed to the treaty.

T. J. Davis says:

I have canvassed the townships of Farmington, Novi, and Highland, with the following results: For reciprocity, 1; against reciprocity, 516.

I want to add in this connection that the feeling among the farmers in my district is not confined to the border line, but appears to be practically the same all over the district.

Many merchants, laboring men, and others who help to make up the consumers in the cities and villages sympathize with the farmer and share with him in his opinion that the treaty is jug handled.

Let us at the outset not forget that our Nation's prosperity comes from the soil.

Do you think that by passing this treaty in its present form you are giving the farmer a square deal, when by its provisions everything the farmer produces is placed on the free list, while pork and other meat products and flour remain on the dutiable list? Why should barley be put on the free list and a tax retained on barley malt? Why is lumber in the rough placed on the free list, while manufactured lumber is retained on the dutiable list? Why are biscuits, costing over 15 cents a pound, taxed 32 per cent? Is this in keeping with your efforts to reduce the cost of living, and that while cattle, sheep, and hogs are free, meats, both fresh and cured, are taxed 1¼ cents per pound, and some say for the benefit of the Meat Trust, but I do not share in this opinion. Wheat is on the free list, but flour is taxed 50 cents per barrel. How much better it would be to defeat the treaty outright or to so amend it as to treat all fairly.

The farmers of the United States have enjoyed the benefits of a protective tariff for many years and been free from Canadian competition, and yet in the Middle West and in the East for many years were not prosperous, and farm values steadily decreased because of the competition of the thousands of acres of new and cheap lands beyond the Mississippi River. The fertile fields of the West offered such attractive inducements that it was quite natural that the farmers took the advice of Horace Greeley and "went West," and as a result it was impossible for the eastern farmer to compete and prosper, and so there were thousands of abandoned farms and discouraged farmers who left their farms and went into the city and villages seeking other employment.

This condition of affairs continued for 30 years or more; now that the western lands, in the main, have been taken up, farm values in the East have increased, while the increased demand for food products has so greatly improved the prices that farmers in the East have prospered as they never prospered before. Electric railways, the automobile, good roads, rural free delivery of mails, the bicycle, and the telephone have all aided in making farm life much more attractive, so that for several years past there has been a marked decrease in the number of abandoned farms and the tide of young men and young women who were bent on going to the cities has turned backward.

There is no denying the fact that for some years, possibly 10, farming has been regarded as a profitable business and farms were being sold and exchanged at remunerative prices. Now, what is going to happen? If this treaty is made effective, it will open up millions of acres of rich, fertile, and cheap lands in the Canadian Northwest, already proving very attractive, as is shown by the hundreds of thousands of people who have gone from the United States and settled on these lands, and to me it seems certain that we must pass through another period of depression like unto that which existed east of the Mississippi River while the farm lands of the West were being taken up; and, as a natural result, Canadian lands must be greatly increased in value at our expense.

What the farmer asks for is a square deal. During the past few years a half million emigrants from the United States have settled in Canada, and they have taken with them hundreds of millions of dollars. The Dominion of Canada has an area more than 700,000 square miles larger than the whole of the United States. The possible wheat belt of Canada is given at about 80,000,000 acres. Of this vast area 6,000,000 acres are now under cultivation.

The Canadian senate committee, after a scientific examination a short time ago, reported an area of 656,000 square miles suitable for growing potatoes, 407,000 square miles suitable for raising barley, and an area of 816,000 square miles suitable for raising wheat, and pasturage lands covering an area of 860,000 square miles.

The farmer in Alberta and Saskatchewan will be as near the American market as the farmers of the West. He can farm on an extensive scale upon land which cost from $10 to $20 per acre, where in the Middle West similar land would be valued at from $80 to $100 per acre.

And again, the Canadian farmer finds a Government which is willing to loan him money for drainage, or to build elevators and storehouses, which belong to the people.

Those who lived during 1893 and 1897 know full well about the dire disaster that came to the country under a Democratic administration and by reason of the Wilson-Gorman tariff bill, and I apprehend that there are none who witnessed those times who care for a repetition of the same. Who is there that does not remember also that after Mr. Cleveland was elected with a Congress Democratic in both branches, it was not necessary to wait for the enactment of the law that the people felt sure would come under a Democratic administration before business in all its branches began to languish, and there was no one business that suffered more than did the farmers of this country? Nature and nature's God were still good to them; better than the Democratic Party at that time, for they could raise horses, cattle, sheep, and abundant crops, but there was no market place where their products could be sold at a profit.

Have you observed how already, so far as the farmer is concerned, conditions are similar to what they were at the time referred to? In the language of one of my constituents, who is deeply concerned: "If the real thing is as much worse as the agitation, I pity the farmer. The bottom is about out on the prices of our farm stuff, and you can not help but realize that when the farmers are getting a good price for their products every other business is all right. Let me give you some figures: Last year lambs were selling from $8 to $9.25, this year for $5; hogs sold last year at from $9 to $10, at present $6.50; last year cattle were selling at $6, now for $4.50 to $5; last year wheat sold from $1.10 to $1.22, wheat is now selling at 78 cents; last year eggs sold at 20 cents, now 13 cents. Everything else in proportion. Everything we have to buy is going the other way."

In this connection I hope I may be pardoned for relating an incident that occurred during the last month of the last campaign. One morning I had occasion to leave my hotel at Flint at 5.30 a. m. to take a train. On the way to the train I was overtaken by a farmer who lived near Flushing, and who knew me. After the morning salutation, he said, "Mr. SMITH, do you think the next House will be Democratic?" I said, "Yes." His countenance at once changed, and he seemed worried. I said, "Why are you so much concerned?" After a moment's hesitation, he said, "I will tell you; just before the last Democratic administration I bought a farm at a fair price, but had to run in debt for the same." Farm products were so low—and he named them one after another, wool at 8 cents, sheep at 50 cents—that he lost the farm, he said.

After McKinley was elected President, following the last Cleveland administration, he purchased another farm at a good price, and proceeded to relate what he had received for farm products since that time, and as a result of the good times under a Republican administration and a protective tariff he had been able to pay for his farm and was out of debt, and he seemed glad, in addition, to tell me that he had come from his home to Flint that morning, 14 miles away, with his automobile. I thought the statement of this well-known and reputable gentleman was worth repeating often, and I proceeded from that time on to tell my audiences what this farmer had told me, and his statement was received with telling effect, for there were so many farmers, as well as others engaged in business, who had had similar experiences during that same period.

I am wondering, if this agreement becomes effective, what proportion of the farmers will be riding in automobiles, and in this connection I can not refrain from saying that I can not understand why some manufacturers of automobiles and farm machinery do not take a different view of this proposition, for they are surely going to deprive themselves of one of the best markets when the American farmer is placed where he will be if this agreement becomes a law. I say this, representing, as I believe I do, the second, if not the first, largest automobile district in the Union. I have no hesitancy in saying that if the American farmer can be let alone millions of automobiles would be purchased by them in the next few years, and, better still, they would be able to pay for them; and I want to say further that by reason of their toil and labor I know of no class of people who are better entitled to the same than they, and I expect to see in the next few years many farmers having what I call a combination automobile, in the nature of the old "Democrat wagon," which can be used for carrying either the products of the farm to market or used for passenger purposes, or both, and I say hasten the day when this will come, for it will be only another pleasure and attraction along with electric railroads, rural service, telephones, and so forth, all of which have helped to make farm life much more attractive, inviting, and agreeable, and has been a source of great help in keeping the boys and girls upon the farm instead of their going into the cities.

And, by the way, what has become of all the efforts that have been made in recent years to encourage farming upon broad and scientific methods, and pleading with the young people to remain upon the farm? It is only a short time ago when the magazines and newspapers of the country bristled with articles of this nature, and the best talent was sought for to speak upon this subject; and I recall that during his last administration President Roosevelt went on a mission of this kind and spoke at the semicentennial celebration of the Michigan Agricultural College, located in the district which honors me with a place here. I was so impressed with that speech—and am now with the good that it has done and is continuing to do—that more than once, in public and private, I have said that I wish it might be read at least twice every year in every pulpit and school throughout the land.

I want to make an appeal that more attention be given to the various agencies of distribution in this country, and when this is accomplished, the problem respecting the high cost of living will be largely solved.
